Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I think the House ought to heed the advice of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] upon the question of patronage, because I do not think there is a man here who knows the evils of patronage, and knows it from experience, more than the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself. [Laughter.] He knows from personal experience more of the evils likely to grow out of the effectiveness of "seeing a man" who has something to do with appointments, or has power to influence elections, and realizes how dangerous it would be to confer this power to prove many expecially where the appointment relates to a pattern on one man, especially where the appointment relates to a matter in which 356 men are supposed to be interested.

I submit, therefore, that after having this "expert testimony," and in view of our own judgment in the matter—a judgment that will confirm what the gentleman has said—we all of us, although we have had a great deal of experience, and some of us have some ability, ought to agree with him, and vote down the amendment.

[Laughter.]
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. A single suggestion. The gentleman's own experience ought to allow him to favor this amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARD-

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.
Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the amendment
I send to the desk.

Insert after line 18, page 21:
"Provided, That all persons employed in the said Library of Congress shall be appointed solely with reference to their fitness for the particular duty, and without reference to their political or party affiliations, and shall be removed for cause only."

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to lift this great Library above and beyond all political influences, and take it away from all the uncertainty of political administration, and for that reason I send this amendment to the desk.

There is a provision in the former part of the bill which declares that employees shall be chosen for their aptness for the position they are to occupy, but I think it not sufficiently definite and emphatic, and I ask that this amendment be adopted.

The care of this valuable and truly national Library in its new and magnificent home can be far better intrusted to men chosen for their knowledge and love of books than to men appointed simply as a reward for political service.

pointed simply as a reward for political service.

The language of the amendment is almost identical with that of the act of May 4, 1882, governing appointments in the Life-Saving Service, which act has been of inestimable benefit to that important service.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Let us hear the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The question being taken on the amendment, the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. McCormick) there were—ayes

61, noes 32.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. This amendment just adopted was made to the bill was it not?

The CHAIRMAN. To the text of the bill.

Mr. FOOTE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the substitute.

Mr. BINGHAM. The substitute is not being considered yet The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is not being considered yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FOOTE] will please withhold his amendment for the present.

There are three amendments pending to the substitute. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] to the substitute, which the Clerk will report. The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the organization of the force to be employed in the new Library building having been completed under the provisions of this act, removals shall thereafter occur only for cause, and after full inquiry.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is an amendment to the substitute.
The CHAIRMAN. That is an amendment to the substitute.
The amendment was rejected.
The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FAIRCHILD].
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, that is an amendment to the substitute also.

The CHAIRMAN. That is an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I only call the attention of the committee to the fact, because there have been so many amend-

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated that it was an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. I understand my colleague from New York
[Mr. QUIGG] accepts that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Nevertheless it must be voted upon.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. It has already been reported; but without objection, the Clerk will again report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That in the copyright department, the appointments for which provision is herein made, to wit: Register of copyrights, $3,000; twentynine clerks, two, at $1,800 each; two, at $1,800 each; three, at $1,400 each; ten, at $900 each, and two, at $720 each, shall be made by the Committee on Patents.

Laughter.]

[Laugnter.]
The amendment was rejected.
The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cummings], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "persons," in the fourth line of the clause relating to appointments and removals, insert as follows:
"On the recommendation of the director of the Library."

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FOOTE] is now recognized for an amendment to the substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "the office of the Librarian of Congress shall thereupon be abolished," insert the following:

"The director of the Library shall have the power to appoint one chief librarian, one librarian to act as superintendent of reading room, twelve assistant librarians, one chief of catalogue department, sixteen catalogues, one superintendent of art gallery and three assistants, one superintendent of hall of maps and charts and two assistants, one superintendent of periodical department, one superintendent of manuscript department and two assistants, one superintendent of mousic department and three assistants, all to be paid salaries as above provided for, but no employee shall thereafter be removed except for cause. The Joint Committee on the Library is hereby empowered in behalf of Congress to assume the charge and custody of the new building for the Library of Congress and to make rules and regulations for its occupancy and use, and, upon satisfactory proof that the duties here-tofore conferred by law upon Bernard R. Green in relation to the construction and completion of the said new building have been fully performed, the Joint Committee on the Library is authorized to discharge the said Bernard R. Green of all duties and responsibilities in connection with said building; that any balance now existing of the appropriations heretofore made for the construction and completion of the said building is hereby made available, not only for that purpose, but also to furnish and equip the said building for its use as the Library of Congress, and also for the removal of the Library collections from the Capitol building to the said new building, and, with the advice and consent of the Joint Committee on the Library, to purchase the necessary furniture for the equipment of the said new building. The Joint Committee on the Library shall have power, except as above provided, to employ or remove all persons for whose compensation, that this removes

Mr. FOOTE. I wish to say, in explanation, that this removes from the substitute offered by my colleague [Mr. Quigg] objections which have been urged on the floor. This gives the director of the Library full power to appoint or remove his immediate force, all the heads of his departments, and all his assistants necforce, all the heads of his departments, and all his assistants necessary to run the Library.

It leaves under the Library Committee the subordinate force, and gives the House of Congress—the lower House—the right to overlook the building, and to have charge of the same to the Committee on the Library. In other words, it merely takes from the patronage that part of the force needed in the Library by the director of the Library, or chief librarian, to properly carry out any scheme he may have in the way of cataloguing or any scheme he may have for the purpose of hastening the progress of the work in this Library, and takes it entirely out of politics. I therefore offer that amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I simply desire to say that the bill submitted

Mr. BINGHAM. I simply desire to say that the bill submitted out. Perhaps the bill submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Quigg] is a consistent bill throughout. This is confusing, and a change of either of these bills in all their consistency— [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Foote] to the substitute which has just been reported.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Quige].

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. QUIGG. Division, Mr. Chairman. The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 85.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I have an amendment I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the gentleman's amendment to the original text?

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Yes, sir. The Clerk read as follows:

Add to line 18, page 21:

"All the above appointments except the Librarian and two assistants are to be made from lists of eligibles to be submitted by the Civil Service Commission, under their rules, who are hereby empowered to hold examinations for all the above positions."

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against that that it changes existing law.

Mr. QUIGG. But my friend wants it taken out of politics.

[Laughter.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. "My friend" is quite able to state what he wants. [Laughter.] I make the point of order that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is constrained to overrule the point of order.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. The point of order I make is that the amendment directing that all appointments should be made under the provisions of the civil-service law is simply directing under the provisions of the civil-service law is simply directing what the President had power to do under the law as it now stands. In other words, it is a change of law as it now exists. The law gives to the President power to issue an order putting all these appointments under the civil service, and it is not necessary for Congress to repeal that provision by directing that it be done in this way. He can make such an order without any legislation of this kind, and it is a change of the law as it now exists.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, that part in the bill as reported by the committee to which this is offered as an amendment is itself a change of existing law, and being a change of existing law, an amendment to it is not obnoxious to the objection that it changes existing law.

existing law, an amenument to it is not obnoxious to the objection that it changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill when reported to the House contained, in the paragraph relating to the Library of Congress, that which is manifestly on its face new legislation. This would have been subject to a point of order under the provisions of Rule XXI, section 2. No such point of order was made, and the bill therefore was sent by the House to the Committee of the Whole for consideration just as it was reported, and in its entirety. Under these circumstances, as has been heretofore several times ruled, no point of order could be made in the committee against the paragraph on or order could be made in the committee against the paragraph on the ground that it contained new legislation. The committee, in other words, could not refuse to consider what the House had sent to it for consideration. But the right of consideration involves also the right of amendment; that is to say, the committee has the right to perfect as it may see fit the matter submitted to it. For these reasons the point of order is overruled. [Cries of "Vote!"] of order could be made in the committee against the paragraph on

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. The House has already voted by two to one for a clause which practically amounts to the same as this, saying that this patronage shall be taken out of politics. Now, if gentlemen seriously intend to accomplish that the House ought to adopt this amendment, as it is the only practical method of carrying out what they have voted for.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that at this stage of the proceedings we ought not to put this House on record in favor of a proposition of that kind.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the oes seemed to have it.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Division. The committee divided, and there were—ayes 37; noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that by unanimous consent the paragraph relating to the civil service was passed over by the Committee on Appropriations is a consistent bill through- for consideration, and that consideration is in order at this time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Under the agreement with the committee, we passed over the paragraph commencing on page 24, Civil Service Commission, from line 6 down to line 19. I have no statement to make in connection with the matter beyond this. Your committee heard the Commissioners of the Civil Service. We gave them the same appropriation for the next year that we have under the current law. One of the Commissioners read to us a careful and elaborately prepared statement, wherein he submitted that at the conclusion of the reorganization of their force of subordinates they would be able to do their work during the next fiscal year with the same appropriation as during the convent. fiscal year with the same appropriation as during the current year. We therefore appropriate the same amount of money for the same subordinate force.

Mr. BROSIUS and Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire addressed the

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paragraph, after which the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The Clerk read as follows:

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For three Commissioners, at $3,500 each; chief examiner, $3,000; secretary, $2,000; eight clerks of class 4; ten clerks of class 3; thirteen clerks of class 2; fifteen clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; two clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; two laborers; engineer, $940; and two watchmen; in all, $91,340.

For necessary traveling expenses, including those of examiners acting under the direction of the Commission, and for expenses of examinations and investigations held elsewhere than at Washington, $7,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. What amendment does the gentleman offer?
Mr. BROSIUS. I have not offered anything. I have simply been recognized and have taken the floor upon this paragraph.
Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, we are under the five-minute rule, and nothing can be spoken to under that rule unless there is some proposition pending. Therefore, if there is no amendment offered there can be no recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] assuming that he was going to offer

Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] assuming that he was going to offer

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, I was recognized by the Chair and I desire to say now that when I suggested the passing over of this paragraph and intimated that I might desire to make some observations upon it, it was understood that an opportunity would observations upon it, it was understood that an opportunity would be afforded when the paragraph should be taken up to submit observations as under general debate. The understanding was that this was to be treated precisely as the matter of the Library has been treated, which was passed over in the same way, and in pursuance of that distinct understanding I rose a moment ago and addressed the Chair and was recognized. Have I the right to proceed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has correctly stated the position.

Mr. CANNON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. Are we under the five-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that this paragraph was passed over by unanimous consent, and that it was understood that when the paragraph was taken up, general debate was to be in order just as though it had come up for the first time.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is correct.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] to yield to me to gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] to yield to me to offer an amendment.

Mr. BROSIUS. I will yield the gentleman two minutes in which to offer his amendment.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that, strictly speaking, amendments are not in order until after the general debate.

Mr. BROSIUS. I know they are not, but I have yielded to the gentleman from New Hampshire two minutes and he can do what he pleases with the time so far as I am concerned. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order against that amendment.
Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand that the amendment is simply read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

Mr. BROSIUS. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Evans].

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I am not at all opposed to a civil-service law which is properly restricted and wisely limited, especially if it be executed in the spirit of fairness which should be behind it, but if it be a cloak merely for partisan benefit or advantage, or a vehicle for foisting upon the people an office-holding class to the enormous extent of nearly 75,000 persons, each of whom will have practically a life tenure, and many of them be in places where the civil-service principle is abnormal, and to my mind wholly inapplicable, then I think it is time to call a halt and consider whether the law itself should not be reconstructed.

I chanced to have charge of one of the largest of the bureaus of the Government when the law went into effect in 1883, and cheerfully bear testimony to its beneficial results within the limited application given to it by President Arthur. Doubtless it was equally useful in some of the respects in which other Presidents have put it in force. That is to say, to the extent that such examinations as are fairly within its principles can be made to show fitness for places in the public service, it is, so far as I can see, unobjectionable; but if offices are to be filled through its operations, with reference to which no sort of congruity can be found between the examinations and the duties of such offices. be found between the examinations and the duties of such offices, then, in my judgment, it becomes absurd. To illustrate: What possible congruity is there between a civil-service examination and inspecting cattle, watching a stillhouse, or hunting a counterfeiter or a moonshiner? I confess my utter inability to see any. Trial and experience are the means of developing fitness for such positions.

I am not here to criticise the President. I feel that the country owes him a strong tribute of praise upon some phases, especially some later phases, of his official conduct, but I think nothing better illustrates what would be the dangerous powers of the President than some later rules made under the civil-service law, if those rules were not subject to revocation. Take, for example, the internal-revenue service. In my judgment, it would have been a most remarkable exercise of authority to extend the civil-service law irrevocably to deputy collectors, storekeepers, etc. The efficiency of these officers is so wholly dependent upon other qualities than those which can be developed by civil-service examinations that my astonishment might have been excessive, but for one chastening, or rather I should say modifying, consideration. Every one or nearly every one of those offices was filled by a partisan of the President before the necessity dawned upon the Executive mind to extend the panoply of civil-service reform over them. It would have excited less suspicion of using a law for party advantage if this extension had been made before the change in incumbents of the offices, or if the places after being made vacant I am not here to criticise the President. I feel that the country incumbents of the offices, or if the places after being made vacant had been filled through the operations of the law, or, indeed, if only half of the incumbents had been removed and their places filled with Democrats.

In either of these contingencies a possible show of fairness might have been preserved. It was certainly the exercise of a very kindly foresight to have the changes all made before any other step was taken. It was well to get good and ready for it. Any law which would admit of such misuse should be reconsidered, or its operations reformed, if the rules made by the President are irrev-

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?
Mr. EVANS. I prefer not to be interrupted now. At the conclusion of my remarks I will try to answer the gentleman's question.

Another instance was that of a certain large office in this city. By some lucky accident those who administered the affairs of that office were informed of the purpose to extend the law so as to embrace it in due season to prepare for the emergency. It had a lump appropriation to pay its expenses from, and had not been limited to any specific number of clerks or employees. Knowing what was to come, the employees of this office were largely increased. The official list was considerably padded, and when the order extending the law to it became effective it was easy to drop all the employees of one party and have a full complement of the faithful to be protected by law.

And I am told that down in a city not very remote from where I live a way has been discovered by which the blind dispenser of civil-service lottery favors can discriminate with unerring exactness between a Republican and a Democrat. Whether these things ness between a Republican and a Democrat. Whether these things all be exactly as stated I can not precisely say, but if they are so it seems to me to be time to look into the situation.

To purely clerical positions in the Departments and large offices, and to a great extent in the postal service, I think the civil-service law should extend permanently. Further than that it might become a cloak for the most violent partisan deceitfulness and misuse if the President could not change the rules. I am not in favor of the bald doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils. There should be no such thing as spoils, and anything that is mere There should be no such thing as spoils, and anything that is mere spoils should be abolished as odious; but I confess it is difficult to convince me that it is the logic of a great political victory that the other side shall still continue to run the Government and be in position, possibly at the very next election, materially to aid in bringing the country under the dominion of the most dangerous political doctrines.

However, Mr. Chairman, while I have thought it well to call the attention of the committee to these matters, I think it is not necessary to repeal the law to remedy them. A careful investigation has left no doubt upon my mind that the whole subject is under Presidential control, and that the rules issued from time to time can be modified or revoked at any time the President may see fit. And I find that the power of revocation has accordingly been freely exercised. In making the comprehensive rules of November 2, 1896, the President expressly revoked all others. If one President goes too far, another may correct it. The power to make rules necessarily includes the power to revoke them. And as the Chief Executive is the real fountain of all appointing power, we might suppose the rules of November 2 were made by the President to conveniently govern in his own Administration but for the very late date of their promulgation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will hear the question that the gentleman from Tennessee desires to ask.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I rose to interrupt the gentleman when he was citing certain facts, to ask him whether there had not been an illustrious example set to the present Chief Magistrate of the country by his immediate predecessor in office in making such been freely exercised. In making the comprehensive rules of Noountry by his immediate predecessor in office in making such changes as the gentleman spoke of.

Mr. EVANS. Possibly so.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a few min-

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me, I do not think the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Evans] has any time to yield.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I did not ask the gentleman for any time.

I addressed the Chair in my own right.

Mr. BROSIUS. But I was in possession of the floor, the genman will remember

Mr. RICHARDSON. I recognize that, and I ask the gentleman if he will not give me five minutes?

Mr. BROSIUS. I can not do so now.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee, and to the gentleman from Pennsylvania also, that it is my purpose at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Evans] to move that the committee rise.

Mr. BROSIUS. He has concluded now.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise

Mr. RICHARDSON. As I understand, this matter will be open for debate to-morrow.

Several Members. Oh, yes.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BINGHAM that the committee rise, it was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DALZELL reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the legislative appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. COURRELL. I desire a change of reference in regard to a petition that was presented by me yesterday praying for the passage of a bill to prohibit the sale of liquor in the Capitol building. It was referred to the Committee on Rules. I understand that the bill on that subject which came from the House is before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and not the Committee on Rules. Upon the suggestion of my friend from Tenmittee on Rules. Upon the suggestion of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. Harris], the petition was referred to the Committee on Rules. I ask that the Committee on Rules be discharged from its consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PLATT. What bill does the Senator from Missouri refer to?

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill proposing to prohibit the sale of interiors in the Control.

intoxicants in the Capitol.

Mr. PLATT. Some bill relating to that subject has been referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I do not know whether that is the bill the Senator refers to.

Mr. FRYE. It is a general bill touching the sale of liquor in the District which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. This bill refers to the sale of liquor in the Capitol building.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the petition go to the committee that has the bill, and then if that committee is discharged, it will go wherever the bill goes. The Committee on Rules does not have charge of that bill now, and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has it. Whatever may be right about it, that is the fact.

Mr. FRYE. I think on the motion of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] the other bill was sent to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question as to the propriety of the reference of the petition. It ought to go to the committee that has charge of the bill, no matter which committee it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Jones of Arkansas in the chair). If there is no objection, the change of reference suggested by the Senator from Missouri will be made. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading be dispensed with, and that the amendments of the committee be considered as they

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, to strike out lines 12, 13, and 14, in the following words: For the rent of a building for the Court of Claims for the balance of the fiscal year 1897, $2,500.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. UNION PACIFIC RAILWAY TRUST NOTES.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yesterday I introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 182) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to take up and pay the Union Pacific Railway Company's 6 per cent trust notes, and making an appropriation for that purpose, which I asked to have lie on the table. I now desire to have the joint resolution read at length, and I wish to make a brief statement in regard to the same before its reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to the holders of the Union Pacific Railway Company's 6 per cent trust notes the amount due thereon, and take possession of the bonds and stocks now held as security for said notes, said bonds and stocks being the property of the Union Pacific Railway Company.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, to whom I desire to have the joint resolution referred, to certain facts in connection with

I am of the opinion that the Union Pacific Railroad was not and is not insolvent, inasmuch as previons to its going into the hands of receivers its income was sufficient not only to pay the operating expenses, but all the interest upon its indebtedness except that which it owed the Government. Nevertheless a floating debt was created for the express purpose, in my opinion, of securing the securities of the company which now are collateral to the trust notes issued for the floating debt.

In 1891 the company issued its 6 per cent gold notes for $8,500,000, or at least the principal and interest amounts to that sum at the present time, and deposited bonds and securities of the Union Pacific Railroad, the bonds and securities of the branch lines of the Union Pacific Railroad, with Morgan & Co. to secure these trust

The notes have been past due for two years. The interest has been unpaid, I understand. It is now proposed on the part of the been unpaid, I understand. It is now proposed on the part of the owners of these notes to foreclose upon the securities, organize a corporation that is to hold the securities, issue bonds to the amount of $10,000,000, and issue $5,000,000 of stock, and deliver the stock to the people who take the bonds and furnish the money to pay these trust notes, the stock to be given as a bonus with the bonds, without any consideration being paid for the stock whatever.

Their apparent purpose is to get possession of the bonds and stocks of the branch lines of the Union Pacific Railroad. These stocks and bonds amount to $93,000,000 and are worth on the mar-stocks and bonds amount to $93,000,000 and are worth on the mar-ket to-day from $35,000,000 to $40,000,000. Yet it is proposed to sell them to pay these trust notes, to get possession of the branch lines, and then, in case the Government takes the main line of the Union Pacific Railroad, divert the branch line to the Northwestern or other roads which nearly parallel the Union Pacific, and greatly decrease the property and the security of the Government.

It seems to me that any business man under these circumstances would step in and protect his interests, and it is the duty of the Government of the United States to step in and protect its inter-Government of the United States to step in and protect its interests and redeem these securities, to pay the trust notes, to take these stocks and bonds, for in case we take the property (and it seems to me likely that we shall take the property of the Union and Central Pacific railroads) these branch lines will be absolutely essential. The money of the Union Pacific Railroad has gone into their construction—$30,000,000 or $40,000,000 of it. Twenty-eight million dollars of these securities are bonds, most of which are worth par, and over $50,000,000—yes, $65,000,000—is stock of the branch line, the Oregon Short Line, and other lines built as feeders to the Union Pacific Railroad.

Now, unless this matter is attended to at once, there is no question but that these people will carry out their scheme of securing control of the branch lines, so as to divert business from the main line of the Union Pacific Railroad to other lines, greatly decreasline of the Union Pacific Railroad to other lines, greatly decreasing the value of the property against which the Government has issued its own bonds.

There is no mention that I know of in the report of the committee with regard to this asset and no notice taken of it, and yet it is one of the most important assets the Government has. An at is one of the most important assets the Government has. An advertisement has been placed in the Wall Street Daily News, signed by Mr. G. Moore, Mr. James W. Alexander, and Mr. John F. Adkin as a committee for the purpose of carrying out this project. Mr. PLATT. Who are they?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I understand this committee represent the estates which control the Union Pacific Railroad, which have made great fortunes out of the management of the road, and have a managed the property as to swindle the sinking fund and are so managed the property as to swindle the sinking fund and prevent the Government from securing its pay, and have discriminated in such manner against the people they have served as to cause great scandal in relation to these roads. But the same people who propose to carry out this plan of diverting this property are the people in reality who control the Union Pacific road to-day; and a part of the plan was a failure to pay interest on the first-mortgage bonds of the road, although the revenue was sufficient to pay the interest, so that the appointment of receivers would be necessary, and the receivers appointed are men in the interest of men who controlled these roads at the time of their appointment, and the receivers refused to use the revenue for the payment of interest on these prior bonds for the purpose of complicating this question and better facilitating the means used to defeat the claim of the Government against this property.

Mr. GEAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.

Mr. GEAR. Can a receiver pay any money without the order of the court?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am not certain that he can or can not.
Mr. GEAR. It is the general rule that where a receiver is appointed by a court, he is governed by the instruction and order of the court, and that he must pay in accordance with the order of the court.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The same people who controlled these roads previous to the appointments of receivers have succeeded in getting the receivers they want. The people who controlled the road before the receivers were appointed and failed to pay this interest, although the roads earned the interest, followed up the same policy. They have not applied to the court for the payment of the interest. They do not desire to pay it. They propose to control this question. It seems to me it is the duty of the Government of the United States to pay off its first indebtedness, to pay off the trust notes, to take possession of these roads, and take possession of the branch lines of the roads and operate them, if necessary, in the interest of the people who dwell along the line. Certainly the Government of the United States can operate these certainly the Government of the United States can operate these roads to the greater profit and satisfaction of the people they serve than the men who have operated them in the past or the men who are engaged in this reorganization scheme.

Mr. GEAR. May I ask the Senator a question? The Senator from South Dakota, I understand, advocates the policy that the Generous shall take possession and operate these roads, if necession and operate these roads, if necession and operate these roads.

Government shall take possession and operate these roads, if nec-sary. Is not that so?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Is that all of your question?

Mr. GEAR. No.
Mr. PETTIGREW. Let us have the whole of it.

Mr. GEAR. In that event, does not the gentleman recognize the fact that upon roads operated by the Government the charges for transportation and passengers are from 30 to 40 per cent higher than upon roads operated by corporations?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am glad the Senator has asked that question, and I shall be glad to answer it. In the first place, I do believe it would be well for the Government to take possession of these roads and operate them. Our experience in the past in the opera-roads and operate them. Our experience in the past in the operation of roads by private corporations has been such that it can not possibly be worse if the Government takes control. On the contrary, I believe that it would be far better.

I will now answer the second part of the gentleman's question. In some of the countries of Europe I am well aware the apparent rates are higher than they are on the trunk lines in the United States. But, Mr. President, it is not the rates that the people of this country complain against: it is the discrimination which States. But, Mr. President, it is not the rates that the people of this country complain against; it is the discrimination which makes the corporations the arbiters of the destinies of men and places; it is discrimination and rebates and fraudulent practices in violation of law, combinations and pools, which give to individuals advantages over their neighbors and which give to towns advantages over competing towns. That is the difficulty more than anything else. If the people of this country could know that the rate was the same to everyone, and if the people could know that every man had an equal and a fair chance in the struggle for existence and in competition for business, the complaints and protests against the railroads of this country would be far less than they are.

Mr. PEFFER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?
Mr. PEFFER. I wish to inquire whether the Senator from South Dakota desires to be understood as stating that in countries where the government as a government exclusively manages the roads the rates are higher than they are in this country?
Mr. PETTIGREW. In some of them they are higher than in this country, upon a mileage basis. In some of them they are not.
In Australia they are higher, but that is a very sparsely settled country. In Austria, I understand, they are not as high, although the passenger rates for first-class passengers is higher than those in the United States. Some of the European countries are deeply in debt and the roads are operated for the purpose of paying off the debt and the roads are operated for the purpose of paying off the debt. However, I think that in Austria this is not so much sought after, and that therefore the rates in that country are less than they are in the United States. I understand that in Belgium the rates are not much different from what they are here. So it is in rates are not much different from what they are here. So it is in Italy, and so it is in France.

Mr. GEAR. May I be allowed to state to the Senator that the ordinary rates in the United States are less than they are in any other country in the world?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think not.

Mr. GEAR. It is the case, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think not. I think it will be found on a thorough examination of the question that the rates in the United States are not lower than in any other country. Take, for instance, States are not lower than in any other country. Take, for instance, the roads in Austria, and the passenger rates have three grades. If you would take an average of the highest rates and the lowest rates, they would be fully as high as they are in this country. The rates for third-class passengers are much less than they are in this country, and the rates for second-class passengers are lower than they are in this country, while the rate for first-class passengers is very much higher than it is in the United States.

Mr. GEAR. I will call the attention of the Senator to the accommodations. They are far inferior in those countries to the accommodations in the United States, and they are such as the American people would not submit to. That is a matter of his-

Then there is one other statement I wish to make. It will be borne in mind that the Populist party at St. Louis declared in favor of the Government ownership of railways. It is a matter of well-known information that that party during the recent campaign just closed investigated this question with the intention of preparing a statement to give to the public to show how much cheaper the Government could operate railroads than a pri-vate corporation, and it is a matter of fact that when they found the facts in the case they desisted, that they did not and never have put out such a statement.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am glad the Senator from Iowa has had an opportunity to inject into my speech a speech of his own. an opportunity to inject into my speech a speech of his own. I said in the first place that it was not so much a protest against the rates in this country as a protest against the discriminations which led to the dissatisfaction with regard to American railroad management. I say again, that if this difficulty were removed, if absolute control on the part of the Government were had, if the interstate-commerce law was amended so that the rates could be absolutely fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if such steps were taken as absolutely to prevent discrimination, it would answer the purpose as well as Government ownership.

But here is an opportunity, Mr. President, to acquire ownership of a transcontinental line. Here is an opportunity to try the experiment and at the same time protect the interests of the Government by operating a railroad by the Government itself. If the experiment is a failure, and if it does not give peace and prosperity to the people it serves, we can very easily afterwards dispose of the property and reconsider our action. It is at least worth

What has been our experience with railroads? The railroads in the United States perhaps clamor more loudly than anyone else against legislation which shall in any way interfere with business, and yet they of all others undertake to overturn the very fundaand yet they or all others undertake to overturn the very funda-mental principle of Anglo-Saxon civilization in claiming that competition is killing, and therefore they ask to be allowed to combine, so as to destroy competition. The great trunk lines west of Chicago are in combination. When their representatives are placed on the stand they testify that they are not, but the evidence disclosed that they were. This was testimony taken last fall to show that these lines were in combination to control business and control rates, and distribute the proceeds of the profits of their unlawful act. The great railroad pool east of Chicago, embracing every road running to the seaboard, is in combination—a combination to control rates, a combination to divide and to distribute the business. These combinations will say to one man in a city or town that he These combinations will say to one man in a city or town that he may do business and his neighbor shall not, and they say it by giving to favored ones a better freight rate, a freight rate so much better than that offered to the public that the difference is a good profit upon the business in which they are engaged, thus destroying competition, and thus gradually accumulating the property of this country in the hands of a few. They discriminate between towns. They say that one town shall be a wholesale point and that another, struggling also for a wholesale trade, shall not, by giving a special rate to favored localities. Against these things the American people protest, and one of the loud outcries against existing conditions results from these monopolies of the railroads of this country.

Therefore, Mr. President, I do believe it would be well if we would take possession of the Union Pacific Railroad, operate it, and would take possession of the branch lines and operate those in the intertake possession of the branch lines and operate those in the interests of the people they serve. I believe that it is the fear that this will be done that has led these people, beginning away back five years ago, to handle this property so as to enable them to sever branch lines from the main line upon which the Government has its security, and at the same time enrich themselves.

Mr. President, the proposition which they propose to carry out is similar to their usual operations. There are $8,500,000 of these trust notes. They propose to issue $10,000,000 of bonds. They propose to divide to the holders of these bonds, without any consideration whatever, $5,000,000 of stock, thus increasing the indebtedness from $8,400,000 to $15,000,000, and thus compelling the Government, if it ever redeems this property, not only to pay to these people the amount due them upon their trust notes, but also to redeem the stock which has been issued without considera-

Mr. President, no wealth can be acquired in that way, except it is acquired at the expense of the men who produce it. Stock issued without consideration upon which some one hereafter is to pay interest is a means of taking from the producers of wealth the result of their toil, for no wealth can be produced except by toil. No wealth can exist except some one has toiled to produce it and manifested self-denial and those traits of character which make good citizenship. If we allow the issuance of stock without the payment of money for it to compel the payment of interest upon it, those who toiled have had taken from them the product of their toil. It seems to me it is time to call a halt; it is time to stop such transactions; and in this case in particular, time to stop such transactions; and in this case in particular, where the Government is directly interested, it is our duty to act

Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a list of the bonds and stocks, amounting to $93,266,087.75, which are held by the Morgan syndicate as security for these trust notes. I wish to call the attention of the Committee on Pacific Railroads to this matter, and very much hope that the joint resolution will be at once reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the statement referred to by the Senator from South Dakota will be printed in the RECORD. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, the very interesting remarks which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Pettigrew] has made should, I think, convince the Senate that its duty is to consider a matter which has been so long delayed and which the Senator from Iowa which has been so long delayed and which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Gear] has so often attempted to have considered; that is, the proposition to settle with the Government the debt of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad companies. It seems to me that there is no question before the Senate or before the country more imperatively demanding attention than this question.

I make these remarks because several years ago—I think as long ago as 1887—the Senator from Maine [Mr. Frye] will perhaps correct me if I am wrong—I was for a short time on the committee to investigate the relations between the Government and these railroad companies. A report for a settlement was then made by railroad companies. A report for a settlement was then made by the committee. I went off the committee soon after that; but from that time to the present the committee on the relations between the Government and the Pacific railroad companies has been trying to obtain consideration in the Senate and in the other branch of Congress of this important question, but it has always in some way been postponed.

The Government now has a debt against these two railroads, the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroad, amounting at the present time, I think, to something like $115,000,000. That seems to attract the attention of no one, and it is in imminent danseems to attract the attention of no one, and it is in infinitely danger of being lost by delay and by inaction, and it seems to me that the request which the Senator from Iowa, the chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, made early in this session, that this matter should receive the consideration of the Senate, and which he renewed yesterday, is not only a reasonable request, but one which ought to receive objection from no quarter. I can not understand why it is that we have been so utterly indifferent to the question of whether a debt to the Government of over $100,000,000 should be secured, if possible, or lost; and I hope, Mr. President, that when the Senate reconvenes after the recess it may address itself to this matter first of all.

I am not now familiar with the subject. I do not know that the method proposed for the settlement of these claims and the security of them is the best that could be devised, but I know from the report of the committee and I know from the remarks just made by the Senator from South Dakota that it is a matter which we ought not to trifle with and neglect any longer.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution introduced yesterday by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. Vest].

Mr. MORGAN. Before that is done, I desire to hear the joint resolution of the Senator from South Dakota read.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to inquire of the Senator from South Dakota whether it is his purpose to refer the joint resolution to a

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to have the joint resolution referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. MORGAN. Then, Mr. President, in connection with that, I wish to state that so far as I am concerned, as a member of that committee, the subject of this resolution is entirely new to me. The committee have never taken it into consideration so far as I know, though I have not been present at every meeting, and the last meetings the committee held last spring I was unable to attend.

The statements made by the Senator from South Dakota are very strong, broad, and very earnest, and doubtless he must feel entirely able to sustain them. If they can be sustained, they show a state of affairs in connection with the administration of the Union Pacific Railway which develops, as I conceive and as I understand, a fraudulent combination among certain persons in-terested in what are called the branch lines of that railway to load down those branch lines with debt, so that they may be absorbed by capitalists; and if the result should be that the Union Pacific Railway, when it is finally disposed of, should not fall into the proper hands, then these gentlemen by combinations and arrangements among themselves can unite these branch roads with the Northwestern system, and thereby make a road paralleling the Union Pacific, which would deprive it of its traffic advantages.

I think that no single mind is capable, without, perhaps, a devo-tion of as much as a year of time to the investigation of the laby-rinth of fraud and rascality which has attended the administration of these two railroads in the West, to understand and to explain to the Senate or to the people of the United States the true and full history of that saturnalia of fraud which has occurred in regard to these two railways.

When the foundations of those roads were laid, as soon almost as they began to be built, in fact before they began to be built, there was developed in the eastern part of the United States what was called the Credit Mobilier, that seemed to have infested the atmosphere even of Congress, and more recently, within the last few months, there has been developed a twin brother of the Credit

Mobilier in the Central Pacific establishment, which has carried on the same processes, by the same methods of bribery and corruption, and to the same results that have inflicted upon this

I do not know, Mr. President, that we shall ever get to the bottom of that; I do not know that it would be for the welfare and peace and good name of this country that these things should really be probed to the bottom; but I know that the enormity of those offenses is so great, the proof of them is so evident, that many members of Congress have staggered at an approach to the subject and have preferred to turn away, and by a sort of silent condonation allow those things to go unreproved and univestigated and to seek some more elegant to we contribute the subject and the seek some more elegant. gated and to seek some more pleasant way out of the trouble and the danger and the load of debt that these transactions have imposed upon the Government and people of the United States. Developments have been made and the record of the proof of them by sworn witnesses is on the files of the Senate and printed accordby sworn witnesses is on the files of the Senate and printed according to its order and is before the country, and no Senator need think he can escape any responsibility for what we shall do here in reference to those railways. There will be no covering up, no hiding out, no shrinking from contact with the subject merely because it is repulsive and unpleasant. It will all have to come to light.

The assaults made to-day upon the managers connected with these branch lines of the Union Pacific Railroad by a Senator in his place demands of the Committee on Pacific Railroads that they should investigate it; demands of that committee, inasmuch as the time of this session is very short, that they should occupy some portion of the holidays in investigating that matter and in making a report upon the accusations made by the Senator from South Dakota as to whether they are to be sustained or whether he is mistaken in his charges; and I propose to ask, as a member of that committee, that we shall sit in vacation and that we shall investigate this subject.

Mr. PLATT. The committee have authority to do that now.

Mr. MORGAN. It is said that the time is short for the con-Mr. MORGAN. It is said that the time is short for the consideration of this measure, and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] has called our attention very properly to the fact that this is a very great matter, involving pretty nearly $200,000,000 of debt against the Government of the United States and an enormous charge upon the people. He calls attention to the fact that that debt is now rapidly maturing, in fact on the 1st day of January, now close at hand, a very large part of it is to fall due, He calls attention also to the fact that the Committee on Pacific Railroads have on frequent occasions endeavored to get a hearing before this body upon reports of bills made by them concerning these two railroads.

Very shortly after the organization of the Select Committee on Pacific Railroads, of which I had the honor then to be appointed a Pacific Railroads, or which I had the honor then to be appointed a member, and have remained on the committee ever since, the committee of the Senate and the Railroad Committee of the other House—I forget its precise designation—united in the report of identical bills to both bodies. The two bills were separate, the one relating to the Union Pacific and the other to the Central Pacific Railway, if I remember the record correctly. At all events, the bills which were reported to each House were identical in their terms. It was a very remarkable fact that one House was their terms. It was a very remarkable fact that one House was under the control of the Democratic party and the other House under the control of the Republican party, and that every member of the Committee on Railroads in each House coincided in the report of those measures. They came here, and, as I remember, the Senator from Maine who sits in front of me [Mr. FRYE] endeavored to call up, and did call up, the report of the committee and the bills, and endeavored to put the bill upon its passage, whereupon Mr. Huntington objected, and insisted that the two bills whereupon Mr. Huntington objected, and insisted that the two bills should be incorporated into one, or, at all events, that they should be considered together. That objection prevailed, and the bill was laid over, because the time was short for the consideration of the measures. From that time to this the committee have never reported a bill until near the close of the last session of the present Congress. We have had very frequent hearings, including hearings from a syndicate of bondholders from Germany, representations of the presentation sented by an honorable attorney from New York by the name of Stetson, who was here for the purpose of assisting that bond syndicate in getting a bill passed to put the control of an American railroad, and run it, in German interests.

Various propositions have come before us in reference to each distinct road, until, after a while, a combination between them seems to have been formed which produced a bill in each House which was satisfactory to the majority of the committee of the Senate and I believe a majority of the committee in the other House. These bills are now pending, and one of them is the bill which the honorable chairman of the committee is now urging for consideration.

Some members of the committee, Mr. President, object to this bill for one reason and some for another, which objections, I dare say, will be stated at large before the Senate whenever we come to the consideration of this very grave and very important mat--grave and important not merely with respect to the amount involved in it and the interests of the people and also of the Government of the United States in those roads, but very grave and very serious in respect of that load of accusation and proof of fraud and crime which has almost buried them out of reach of human consideration.

Mr. President, I am in favor of taking up those bills and considering them; I am in favor of having this subject disposed of; but when they are considered and disposed of I wish it understood that there will be a claim of latitude of debate upon this subject that is commensurate simply with the magnitude of the question involved and the great amount of proof that has been brought to the attention of the Government and the Senate by the reports of the attention of the Government and the senate by the reports of the committee. I am in favor of the consideration of the bill. I am not in favor of its passage; I am opposed to it. In that oppo-sition I wish to state now that I could have no personal interest or bias in the matter. The people whom I, along with my honorable colleague, represent have no interest in it in a financial sense. We are stationed in what may be called the doldrums of this question, where no breeze blows in any direction; we are down in Alabama, at a point where it is impossible to benefit that State by giving a preference or an advantage to one line of these railways over another. If our interests as a people incline in either direction, it is toward the Southern Pacific Railway as a competitor of these roads. Therefore I feel authorized to cast my vote, and to conform in a large degree my judgment and my opinion according to the best interests of two classes of people. One class is that wonderful, enterprising, and grand group of people on the Pacific Slope, and the other is the great body of people who live between the Missouri River and the Pacific Slope.

It is my nurpose Mr. President to take care of the interest.

It is my purpose, Mr. President, to take care of the interests of the Government of the United States in the best way that I can, for we shall never get justice. That is impossible. Justice has passed out of the reach of judgment, and we can never lay our hands on it for the benefit of the Government. But the people live, the people have their rights, the people must furnish all the money that will ever be drawn into the coffers of these great railway systems. They can not live a day without the contributions of the people. They are as helpless without those contributions as a cron of corn planted in the Sahara Desert is fruitless and helpless a crop of corn planted in the Sahara Desert is fruitless and helpless without the rains of heaven to fall upon it. They have no income except what the people must contribute. Therefore I take great interest in seeing that the people of the country I have referred to shall have their rights respected and their future secured against monopoly by combinations between the Union and Central Pacific railroads or the Southern Pacific road and the other transcontinental railroads of this country falling into private hands. All of them must live upon the people, and all of them in combination will constitute themselves again, as they have done in the past and are doing now, a ruling, powerful, unconquerable monopoly, that will wring the last drop of substance out of these people, according to the axiom of railroad managers that they must earn from the people "all that the traffic will bear." That is the rule by which monopoly measures necessity.

Mr. President, no remonstrances have ever come to the Senate of the United States from any section of this Union so strong, so earnest, so well sustained by proof, so supported by the entire mass of the people as those which have come from the Pacific Coast against frauds in the administration of these roads against their being released from their indebtedness to the Government of the United States, and against having towering fortunes built up and put in the hands of grasping monopolists through their sacrifice.

The files of the Senate are loaded with those remonstrances, petitions, and arguments. They have been, many of them, printed here, and the aggregate would form many large volumes.

The people of California and of the whole Pacific Slope are asking for nothing but relief against the power of the monopoly, which they assert has already robbed them of these vast millions which have been aggregated into private fortunes through the management and the managers of these railroads and which stand there as a threat against the prosperity of the Pacific Slope worse and more alarming than any which has ever been made against any section of the American Union. No people have suffered like they have; none are bound in such chains as bind them; there are none to whom agricultural, industrial, and commercial prosperity and expectation is so sad a blank of hopeless endeavor for the future

I therefore hope, Mr. President, when we come to the consideration of this question, that we will not deny to these people a voice in these proceedings, and that we shall not treat it simply as a cent per cent arrangement by which certain men are to grow rich and the world and people are to grow poor. I hope, casting aside sympathy, but coming to those moving considerations which are supposed to stir the heart of justice, that we shall come to this question with a strong determination that the people of this country, at least, shall not be sacrificed to this Gorgon of Heretofore I have had the honor to submit to the Senate of the United States a motion, which is now on the Calendar, to have the bill which has been reported to this body recommitted with in-Those instructions change the plan of our action, and, in my humble judgment, they secure to the people of the Pacific , the intermediate populations, and to the Government of the United States all that is just and right and conscientious in our action upon this great subject. More than that, they secure to every honest stockholder, every bondholder, whether a first or second mortgage bondholder, full and perfect guaranty of all his rights when they are measured by the general aggregate value of this entire property and its interests.

The Union Pacific Railroad Company, if I am not incorrectly informed—and, if I am, some member of the committee on this floor will correct me—has now lying in the treasury of its receivers money enough, acquired from the income of that road after enormore. money enough, acquired from the income of that to pay the intermous expenditure has been made in rebuilding it, to pay the interest on the first-mortgage bonds as it is due. No one denies that est on the first-mortgage bonds as it is due. No one denies that proposition, and I must be right about it. That railroad company is not bankrupt in the sense of its being unable out of its earnings is not bankrupt in the sense of its being unable out of its earnings to pay the interest on the first-mortgage bonds, and yet it comes here as a bankrupt mendicant, pretending to be in the last stages of beggary for the purpose of exciting, possibly, the double con-sideration of pity for those who are concerned in it and the necessity of hasty action to close out this bankrupt concern in the quickest way possible. The Central Pacific Railroad Company has paid the interest on its first-mortgage bonds up to date. It has done not only that, but it has paid from 1 to 14 per cent dividend to the foreign stockholders, who own 51 per cent of the stock of that road. That company comes here as a bankrupt concern after having paid the interest upon its first-mortgage bonds and a dividend to its British stockholders.

I suppose these facts, Mr. President, will have some weight upon the judgment of Congress as to the amount of haste it is necessary for us to make in order to save something out of this wreck. It is regarded now that all we can make out of it is some fees for salvage, when the truth is that both these railroads, upon the showing, one of the court and the other of the directors, are solvent and able to steer along. They are both doing what has become a fixed and settled practice amongst railroads in the United States, running down their receipts and injuring their property when in the hands of receivers, or when, for other reasons, it is thought to be necessary to do so in order to force the bankruptcy and sale of the roads, so that a few large moneyed men may buy them in for nothing. That is the game which we have to confront here to-day. That is the question which stands in front of this great subject that will come up here as soon as the Senator from Iowa can get the right of way for his bill with the consent of this body. We have to deal with a false pretense the consent of this body. We have to deal with a false pretense in the outset of this proposed legislation.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. Gear] asked a question of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Pettigrew], which, as well as I could hear him, was whether the courts have not fixed the rights as between the branch railroads and the trunk roads on the Union Pacific line, or whether the courts could not fix or adjust those rights. That is the way I understood the question.

Mr. GEAR. I beg pardon. I did not ask the Senator from South Dakota that question. I simply asked the Senator the question whether the courts did not fix the amounts to be paid by receivers at all times, and to whom they should be paid. I simply asked for information.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to interpose right here the statement that the Government of the United States has never been made a party to the suits for foreclosure of the Pacific railroads, and if the Attorney-General of the United States has due consideration for the welfare of this people and the integrity of the Government, he will never go into court and submit himself to that jurisdiction on a bill of foreclosure.

Mr. GEAR. I suppose, I will inform the Senator, that when a suit is pending before a court for the foreclosure of a road, notice would be served on all parties in interest, and naturally would be served on the Government. As to that I do not know, however. I have not asked the Attorney-General.

Mr. MORGAN. The Government of the United States can not be sued without its consent. There is no law which authorizes it be sued in respect of these railroads.

Mr. GEAR. I will state to the Senator from Alabama that on that question there is some difference of opinion even among my legal friends. I am not myself a lawyer, but many of the best lawyers in this country hold that when Congress enacted the law of 1864, subordinating the first mortgage of the Government to the mortgage of the railway, permitting it to become the first mortgage in its turn, the Government became in that sense the same as an individual. It is a question of law.

Mr. MORGAN. That question came up in committee. It was presented by a very bright and astute lawyer, and he seemed to try to work out the right or the power to make the Government of the United States a party defendant to the suit, upon the idea that the Congress of the United States, in according the priority to what are called the first-mortgage bonds, had also accorded to the courts jurisdiction to determine that priority and to administer it. I think I should not have much difficulty with the sound lawyers of this body upon a proposition of that kind. I do not think any man yet has ever acquired the right to sue the United States by inference from its transactions. I understand that that right can not be exercised against this great sovereignty otherwise than through a law constitutionally enacted.

Mr. GEAR. There is no doubt, I imagine, in the Senator's mind as a lawyer that the Government could waive its right by an act? Congress could do so?

Mr. MORGAN. Of course.

Mr. GEAR. Then the doubt remains whether by the act of 1864 the Government did or did not waive its rights. That is the point as to which some of my legal friends in the country and also some in this body differ. Mr. MORGAN. The Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman who presented that point seemed to be entirely satisfied, after a few inquiries were made as to the foundation of his proposition, that he was resting on very slight grounds. At all events, the Attorney-General, in whose keeping the statute places the control of this property, has never keeping the statute places the control of this property, has never gone into court and made himself a party; and he never will do so, in my judgment. I hope he never will. So we have rights which lie behind any power of a court of foreclosure, that are fixed by statute, conclusively fixed, and the Attorney-General, before he could get his consent to submit the rights of the Government of the United States to the adjudication of a Federal court, would have to repeal a half dozen statutes on our book, including the charters of these companies themselves. It would be a travegulous assumption of submittive on the part of the Attorney. be a tremendous assumption of authority on the part of the Attorney-General if he should undertake such a universal repeal of statutes as would become necessary in order to deprive the Gov-ernment of the United States of rights which have accrued by forfeiture.

There is a good deal of misapprehension about this point, and perhaps I might take a moment to state what it is without underperhaps I might take a moment to state what it is without undertaking perhaps to remove it. There seems to be a misapprehension prevalent in the minds of very good lawyers who have not looked carefully into the statutes that, because bonds and mortgages are out, any court having jurisdiction of a mortgage foreclosure can exercise its power to take this property under its control and administer and dispose of it according to its judgment.

In the charter of these two railroads and in various measures which have become laws since that time there was fixed in favor of the United States that which has never been surrendered; that is to say a strict statutory lien mon this property which differs from say, a strict statutory lien upon this property which differs from a mortgage toto ceelo, and the condition upon which the property was to pass into the hands of the United States was such that if the corporations failed to comply with certain requirements of the act, amongst which is the payment of these bonds, the whole property of the company is forfeited by operation of law.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Alabama, in connection with the statement he made in regard to the appearance of the Government in this suit, be kind enough to state what he understands by ment in this suit, be kind enough to state what he understands by that part of the President's message which, according to my recollection—I have not turned to it—is to the effect that unless something is done by Congress in the very near future the executive department will take steps by the 1st of January, I believe, to protect the interests of the Government. Now, I understand that the only way in which the Government can do that is by interpleding in the pending sait pleading in the pending suit.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Missouri asks me to inter-Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Missouri asks me to interpret the President's message, but in all Egypt there was but a single man, and he was divinely inspired, who could interpret the dreams of Pharaoh. I suppose the Senator from Missouri can interpret that message if anybody can, but I do not stop to try to

What I conclude about it is that the President has found him-self in possession of a supposed authority to dispose of this prop-erty on and after the 1st of January, when a very large part of these bonds will fall due, I understand, and the companies are expected to default in the payment of them. Whether he had his mind fixed upon the enforcement of that lien according to statu-tory requirement and through the agencies provided by the statute as a part of the duty of the Executive of the country, or whether he had his mind fixed upon the supposed power of some court to foreclose the mortgage, as it is called, in some pending suit, I do the default was committed; and the statute creates a forfeiture mark the word—a forfeiture of that property into the rightful ownership and possession of the Government of the United States.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me to have that portion of the President's message read? I only quoted it from memory.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish the Senator would excuse me from discussing the message, because I am not now paying any attention to its statements.

Mr. VEST. I simply desire to ascertain, because it is a matter of very great public interest, whether there is any probability of the Government interpleading, as the Senator said there is not, or that he hopes there is not. Of course I will not interrupt his remarks if he desires that I shall not.

Mr. MORGAN. The Government can not interplead in regard to the Pacific railroads, certainly, because there is no suit pending. If the Attorney-General brings an interpleader, he cuts the system of transcontinental railroads in two, and takes one end of it and interpleads about it, leaving the other in the air. I can not suppose that the President of the United States ever imagined that that the President of the United States ever imagined that that would be the national policy, or that he would indulge himself in any conjecture or ruminations about it.

Mr. VEST. There is a suit pending.

Mr. MORGAN. The suit pending is in regard to the Union Pacific?

Mr. VEST. Yes. Mr. MORGAN. None is pending in regard to the Central Pacific; and yet Congress designed those two roads to be one system, and when we abandon that design we may as well throw to the wind all our interest in them. So far as the people are concerned, it would be better if they had never been built rather than they should be converted into engines for their destruction.

I will proceed now. Here is a forfeiture of all the property of these railroad companies for condition broken in the nonpayment of the bonds and for failure to comply with various other condi-tions. What is the result of that forfeiture? It transfers, by force of the statute, the possession and ownership of this property into the United States. There is no intermediary; no intermediate act is necessary to vest the title; no action of any court is necessary. Hence we have empowered the President of the United States in the original statute, and we have repeated that authorization through the Secretary of the Treasury, to enter into possession, to take possession, of this property and hold it for this Government. On the happening of that default, whether it has happened or whether it may hereafter happen, these two railroad companies after that have no more right of property in the property covered by their charters than I have. Their right of property ceases and determines and passes by operation of law into the hands of the Government of the United States, and the President of the United States is empowered then, by the same statute and subsequent laws, to take possession of it, but not to dispose of it. Congress alone can dispose of it, whether the President or a court is selected as the agent for that purpose.

Now, if I am right in my attitude on this question, that property belongs to the Government of the United States to-day, or will belong to it when the first forfeiture happens. The remainwill belong to it when the first forfeiture happens. The remaining duty is merely for Congress to provide how it shall be disposed of. Numbers of erudite gentlemen, whose attention has not been riveted upon this subject, and whose special duty it has not been to investigate it, have insisted from time to time that the Government of the United States by no means whatever ought to own this property, and they have seemed to suppose that it would require some new legislation in order for that ownership to come about, whereas in the very charter under which these railroad companies were organized a provision for the ownership of this property by the Government of the United States was expressly made, the conditions all stated, and the manner of acquiring property by the Government of the United States was expressly made, the conditions all stated, and the manner of acquiring actual possession provided for. And to-day, instead of having to enact laws to take possession of this property, or to declare a forfeiture, if we propose to turn this property into other channels, private ownership by contract with Congress, or through a court, or in any other way, we shall have to repeal the laws which stand upon the statute book in order to get at the subject.

Now that is a great wantage ground for the Government of the

Now, that is a great vantage ground for the Government of the United States which I for one do not propose to give up. We can hold that vantage ground in virtue of the statute under which the roads have been built, and we can say to these men: "Now, if you want to buy those roads you have to stand on an equality with everybody else. Bring up your money and buy them if we desire to sell them. If we do not wish to sell them, get out of these offices here; go hence, and we will put into the corporations not know.

But I was about to state, and I will proceed with my statement, that this statutory lien covers all the property of every kind and character, real, personal, and mixed, in action or in possession, equitable or legal, of these railroad corporations at the time when

We will not have the offices of these railroad companies of them. We will not have the offices of these railroad companies filled by political tricksters, whether they are Democrats, Republicans, Populists, or whatever else. It shall be no bureaucracy at all. The Executive of the Government of the United States shall have nothing to do with the roads unless it may be an inspection, which we may allow to be made through the Commissioner of Railroads, and a report of their condition for the information of the Executive and of Congress. We will turn you out of doors, who have lost this property by your fraudulent defalcations and have no longer any interest in it." We will take the five Government directors who are now allowed by law in these railroad companies, the Government of the United States not having one dollar of stock in them, and we will multiply those directors until dollar of stock in them, and we will multiply those directors until we make fifteen or whatever number the charter requires. We will put a president over that board of directors, and we will say to them: "Take these roads and manage them as if they belonged to the stockholders whom you represent." If you send those railthe stockholders whom you represent." If you send those railroads to a court, the receiver does that, or a multitude of receivers do it. Instead of having judicial receivers to run a great railroad system under the control of a judge with ermine on his shoulders and sitting on the bench, we will have a number of receivers appointed under the authority of the Congress of the United States, who shall supplant and take the places of these defaulting directors, and use all of the corporate powers as they now exist or as they may be conferred by acts of Congress, for the purpose of working the companies out of debt.

Here is basis enough. As to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, if it can pay a dividend to its stockholders, it is good property; and that it does so no man on this floor will deny, or, if he does, I have the proofs to show that the fact is as I have stated it.

erty, and that it does so no man on this floor will deny, or, if he does, I have the proofs to show that the fact is as I have stated it. As to the other road, the Union Pacific, it has now in reserve, as I am informed—I do not state it positively, because my information may be somewhat indefinite about it—money enough to pay interest on its first-mortgage bonds, and thus to upset the suit for the foreclosure, the basis of which is its failure to pay the interest on the first-mortgage bonds whenever that money is applied to the declared purposes of the suit. It is holding on there now by the skin of its teeth, trembling lest the jurisdiction of the court should slip from under it by the application of the money to the payment of the interest on the bonds and the extinction of them, whereupon there would no longer be any basis of jurisdiction in the court.

of the interest on the bonds and the extinction of them, whereupon there would no longer be any basis of jurisdiction in the court. Now, Mr. President, this is a general outline of the instructions to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, which I have proposed and shall offer to the Senate in regard to a proper system of administering this property. I think I shall be perfectly able to demonstrate that with the assistance of the Government of the United States, such as we are obliged to give now in meeting the Gov-ernment bonds and in taking care of what is called the prior lien upon it, with no greater latitude of legislation or committal of the upon it, with no greater latitude of legislation or committal of the Government to responsibilities, we can do just what we are compelled now to do, and save this property for the creditors, the stockholders, the Government, and the people.

A question has been raised here as to whether railroads under the control of governments under bureaucratic control in Europe have paid. They may or may not have paid. I do not undertake to measure American institutions or American experience by forcion institutions or forcion experience. Our Government is supto measure American institutions or American experience by for-eign institutions or foreign experience. Our Government is sup-posed to be one of the people, for the people, and by the people, and in their supreme authority over the Congress of the United States and the Executive, inside of the Constitution, the people are supposed to be quite competent at all times to see that right, equity, and justice prevail in the administration of any part of our Government, and particularly of a great public trust, for this is a great public trust. It makes no difference how the trust may have been created, or what duties the Government of the United States may have assumed in regard to public or private corporastates may have assumed in regard to public or private corpora-tions; the great trust remains. It makes no difference what ques-tions may possibly arise in the minds of strict constructionists as to the authority of Congress to do these things. It is sufficient to say that they have been done. They are accomplished facts. They are on the statute books. What I propose to do is merely to work out such results as are unquestioned in respect to their constitu-tionality and their propriety. I do not wish to change the laws under which this great national trust was created, but to execute those laws in securing to the United States forever the national advantages that were contemplated in the enormous grants of and loans of money that were made to secure them.

But, sir, we passed the laws in regard to those railroad companies at a time when no State intervened between the Missouri River and the California line. It was all territory subject to the jurisdiction of Congress. There was no impediment of any kind. If you were now to undertake to pass a law of that kind in this body, objection would be made by State after State against your right to do so unless your submitted to this cyclifortion or that right to do so, unless you submitted to this qualification or that or the other in respect to taxation or some other matter; perhaps as to the right of way. The whole thing rests upon legislation made at a time when there was no obstruction. I for one, sir, am opposed to surrendering that power into the hands of any set of private men. It is a trust, a great national public trust for beneficent and wise purposes, and it seems almost as if it were a benevolence from on high that our predecessors seized upon the opportunity to exercise on behalf of the United States those powers which were then unquestioned for the benefit of this great country, the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts and the people thereof, and all the people in the intermediate sections of country. It is a great public trust. Connected with it is the right of the Government of the United States to carry its armies, its munitions of war, its supplies of every kind, its officers, its mails, through over these roads and to control the telegraph lines upon them. There is one single item in this matter which I think would convince any American who was considering the rights and the future prosperity of this great land that we can not afford to convince any American who was considering the rights and the future prosperity of this great land that we can not afford to place these railroads in private ownership, and especially in the ownership of a foreign German syndicate like that which was advocated by Mr. Stetson before the committee. We can not afford to do it. What item is that? It is the supply of our steam navy in the Pacific Ocean with coal. Sir, if we had the Nicaragua Canal, which in my estimation is one of the greatest enterprises with which the Covernment could possibly be expressed in reserve. with which the Government could possibly be connected, in passing our coal ships through that canal and up the coast of Mexico and California, and Oregon and Washington, they might be taken in flank, captured, interrupted by any enemy which we might find on the high seas. How important is it, therefore, that the Government of the United States should have the ability at its own will and pleasure, without the interruption of commerce or the consent of any private interest, to put these roads under con-trol of its military authorities at any moment that it chooses to do so for the purpose of supplying coal to a fleet in the Pacific Ocean. Does anyone here suppose that Great Britain, who absolutely owns the larger part of and controls the Canadian Pacific Rail-vay, would ever give up her power over that railway to the extent of having to depend upon private consent, or private license, or private obstruction, or law suits which might intervene before she could transfer her troops or munitions of war, her coal supplies and provisions, across through Canada to the Straits of Fuca? Great Britain has coal in Vancouver. She has plenty of good steaming coal there, but she has Esquimalt between that coal and steaming coal there, but she has Esquimalt between that coal and the Pacific Ocean, and we have nothing. Whether we can find outside of Esquimalt a location on which to build fortifications to hold that great fortress in check, no man has yet reported. I have inquired of many, and I can not find out that we have such a position. I dare say we have not got it. But the single item to which I call attention, the absolute necessity of having these railroads at all times under the control of the Government of the United States, is so impressively important that I can not at least shut it out from my thoughts, and I can not consent—I never could consent—to abandon the control of the Government of the United States over this property into private hands, especially if United States over this property into private hands, especially if they are foreign hands.

Mr. President, am I not right in saying that in the United States to-day there is not a railroad 200 miles long, perhaps not one 100 miles long, the control of which is not virtually in the hands of foreign people? Am I not right in that statement? An American stockholder in an American railroad would be a curiosity who ought to be put in the side show of a circus.

Mr. GEAR. May I interrupt the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. GEAR. The Senator from Alabama is undoubtedly look-

Mr. GEAR. The Senator from Alabama is undoubtedly looking for information.

Mr. MORGAN. I am.

Mr. GEAR. The Senator states that he thinks there is no railroad 200 miles long in this country which is not owned by foreigners. I can cite him a road seven or eight thousand miles long, 58 per cent of the stock of which is owned by women in this country and 78 per cent of the stock of which, including the ownership of the women, is owned as trust funds by colleges and similar institutions

Mr. MORGAN. Who own the bonds?
Mr. GEAR. The bonds are owned like any other paper. They are owned wherever they may be held. They are largely held, I will state for the information of the Senator, by the people of this country, and the road is a dividend-paying road.
Mr. MORGAN. If you will point out to me the men who own the bonds, I will tell you the men who control the road.
Mr. GEAR. Not necessarily; not in the case of a dividend-paying road.

paying road.

Mr. MORGAN. There is no question about it.

Mr. GEAR. They control the road only when the road defaults in dividends, and this road has never defaulted. Therefore the bondholders have nothing to do with it except to cut their coupons.

Mr. MORGAN. Suppose they have not. I would like mightily to believe that they have not.

But, Mr. President, there are very few dollars put into the treasuries of railroads in the United States after current expenses are settled for that do not go abroad. I am not complaining of it. I regret it. I think the people have been very foolish about it, but still it is so. I am not going to complain about it, or anything of that sort; but still, in looking out for the preservation of the powers that Congress now possesses over these railroads, I must be permitted to cast my eyes in the direction from whence comes the real control of the railroads of the United States; and when we have got one of them that we can keep our hands upon, I am

we have got one of them that we can keep our hands upon, I am in favor of doing it.

Mr. President, these two roads have cost the United States an immense amount of money. We have had to pay the interest upon these bonds straight along for thirty years without any recoupment or recovery of the money excepting possibly some lit-tle driblet in what is called the Thurman fund in the Treasury. When we come to settle this final account, we can not get interest on that interest; we shall have to take it straight, and with a great reduction, very likely; perhaps there will be no collection who has paid this money? The people of the United States tributary to the roads. These men who control these roads have been dealing with money that has been extracted from the people been dealing with money that has been extracted from the people without a full consideration, largely without justice, when you come to reach the equities of the account. These roads have cost the people of the United States enormously, and I do not see any reason why Congress should get so disgusted with the frauds that have festered in these companies as that they will turn their backs in holy horror upon the question and say, let us march out of it and throw the people's rights to the dogs, and tax them still more to pay this debt. to pay this debt.

No, sir; let us take care of these people. Let us take care of them now and in the future, as to their present rights and their prospective rights. Let Congress march up for once in its existence squarely to the duty of taking care of the people, for there is not one dollar of this money with which we are dealing that has not come from the pockets of the people, and there is not a dollar of it that will not come from the pockets of the people in the

These railroads have been built without drawing upon the private purses of the men who built them for a single dollar. They vate purses of the men who built them for a single dollar. They claim to be the holders and owners of property valued here at a low rate, $90,000,000, but in fact far exceeding this low estimate. These men have acquired this property, and they have got their fangs upon it, and it has never cost them a dollar out of their pockets up to to-day. And they have grown enormously rich in the use of the money of the people. After the roads have been robbed to the satisfaction of the most gluttonous of the misers of the world, they were alleged to be hankyrupt, and all of the transport.

robbed to the satisfaction of the most gluttonous of the misers of the world, they were alleged to be bankrupt, and all of that money has come out of the pockets of the people.

I for one am for holding on to the powers that we have got over these roads until we can again earn it and pay the people out of debt. They can do it. There is no trouble about it. Over that railroad I would not be heard to deny that the Congress of the United States, with the powers reserved in these charters, had the authority to fix the rates of toll. If these people are ever robbed by high rates under the plan I have proposed, it will be because Congress will consent to it. There is no occasion for doing that. On the contrary, it is our duty to see that they are not robbed.

More than that, Mr. President, the administration of those railroads in the hands of an honest power such as Congress would be.

roads in the hands of an honest power such as Congress would be, will set a precedent and establish an example for the management of other railroads in the United States that will force the respective State railroad commissioners to bring them square up to the line and make them do their duty. We will demonstrate under this adand make them do their duty. We will demonstrate under this administration that it is within the reach of the powers of law and correct administration to accomplish such a grand result; and having done that, we perhaps will have done more to disentangle this Gordian knot that we are now trying to cut with the sword of this bill than we could ever do under other circumstances.

I would not have the Government of the United States manage arate the management of it as far from the powers of the Executive as the management of a reilread in the powers of the Executive as the management of a reilread in the powers of the Executive as the management of a reilread in the powers of the Executive as the management of a reilread in the powers of the Executive as the management of a reilread in the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the management of the powers of the Executive as the powers of the Executive as the power of the power of the power of the Executive as the power of the tive as the management of a railroad is separated from the power of the executive when it is in the hands of a judicial receiver. One or the other has to do it, or else we must huddle this property up together and put it up at auction. Who is going to buy it? What American can buy it? You may take all the grand estates that have been accumulated out of these railroads in the past and that now look like towering, hanging gardens of royalty above the heads of the people, and coin them into money, and they can not buy them.

Whenever this property is sold at auction it will be bought abroad, mark you.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly. Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon.

The Senator a moment ago referred to his plan, as I understood him, and to certain results which would follow the plan of the Senator from Alabama. Will which would follow the plan of the Senator From Alabama. Will the Senator be kind enough to state what plan he proposes?

Mr. MORGAN. The plan is developed in the resolution of instruction which is on the Calendar. I have not had it sent to the committee, but all the members of the committee have seen it. It is discussed in a report which I had the honor to make at the last session of Congress upon this subject. I call it my plan simply because I happened accidentally to fall upon it after reading some session of Congress upon this subject. I call it my plan simply because I happened accidentally to fall upon it after reading some decisions of the Supreme Court and the views of a number of gentlemen of very great ability, particularly of California. I am informed—I hope it is true—that a committee of the most intelligent and enlightened citizens of California are now preparing a substitute for this bill, following in some degree perhaps the plan that I have suggested, which I hope to be able to get here in time for its discussion before the bill is passed.

I myself do not want to take an hour for delay, but I do not want hasty consideration. I want the opportunity I now enjoy as a Senator to look at this great subject in the light of truth, sincerity, honesty, and lawfulness, and when I have done so to come to my conclusions about it, without reference to whether it is going to enrich one man or impoverish another, except, always, that the general great body of the people must be cared for under the administration of this road. We can not abdicate that duty. Whatever you may do here, as long as I live and have the power of expression, I will challenge the right of the Congress of the United States to subordinate and subject the people, particularly of the Pacific Coast and the intermediate country, to the will of incorporators, men of power and wealth, who may happen to own this road. Let us stand by the people. They are the life of this country. own this road. Let us stand by the people. They are the life of this country. There is nothing in America that is worth considering at all except the character and rights of the American people brought in contact with the resources which a benevolent Providence has placed within their reach. Let us stand by these people, see that they are not wronged, that the powers of justice till cried that its strong right over its at their reach. still exist, that its strong right arm is not shortened, neither is it weakened; that the sword of justice is not dulled by any seduction. Let it fall where it is destined to fall. Let those who have sinned be condemned, but let the righteousness of the people prevail against iniquity through the action of their servants in

This is all I care to say upon the subject now. I wanted to bring it to the attention of the Senate, but I did not expect to do it to-day, until the resolution of the Senator from South Dakota seemed to make my remarks pertinent.

Mr. GEAR. Mr. President, I do not wish to discuss this ques-

I am very glad, however, that it has come up incidentally through the remarks and the resolution offered by the Senator from South Dakota. It is evidence to me that it is a desire on the part of the Senate to take up this important measure. The conditions that surround the case are simply these: Ninethe conditions that surround the case are simply these: Mine-teen million dollars of bonds have matured and will mature on the 1st day of January. Between now and January, 1898, forty-one million more dollars of Government subsidy bonds will have matured, which it is incumbent on the Government to

The attention of Congress is called to this question imperatively The attention of Congress is called to this question imperatively by the President of the United States and by the Secretary of the Interior, and also by the Commissioner of Railroads. The President of the United States says that it has assumed such an imperative position that the duty will fall on him, under the act of 1887, to protect in some way the rights of the Government, if Congress shall fail to act upon it. How they shall be protected in the event that the President of the United States has to resort to the event of 1887 we can simply imagine. It seems to me that to the act of 1887 we can simply imagine. It seems to me that the time has come when some action should be had by Congress on this matter. The other branch of Congress, I see, has set apart four days in January for the discussion of the bill pending in that body.

One word in regard to the bill pending from the Committee on One word in regard to the bill pending from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, of which committee I have the honor to be chairman. I do not think the members of that committee, who were united, with the exception of the distinguished Senator from Alabama, in favor of that report, were wedded either to that plan or any specific plan, but they are simply governed by what they desire to have done for the interest of the Government in saving the large amount of money, $115,000,000, which is involved in this transaction. Personally, for myself, I will simply say I am opposed in toto to the policy and principle of the Government buying and operating roads. From my observation and from the experience of other countries (which the Senator says is no guide for us) the results are not favorable to Government operation, for us) the results are not favorable to Government operation, because such roads are more expensive than the roads in this country.

In so far as the right of the Government to operate a road is concerned, I think nobody will deny that the Government has the right, because it is a principle of law which every lawyer understands and which certainly every layman should understand that in times of exigency and of national peril the laws are subordinated to the action of the Government, and it has a right to take possession of any road in this country and operate it for the benefit of the Government when the necessities of the case are such as to require it.

And, as I said before, I am very glad this discussion has come up, and, as I gave notice yesterday, I shall call up the bill immediately after the holidays.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I approve of the suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama that the committee should take a read lack into this question during the holiday recess. take up and look into this question during the holiday recess. I hope they will do so, and I hope they will take into consideration in that investigation the fact that in 1891 the Union Pacific Railroad owned and had in its possession $65,000,000 of the stocks of the branch lines of the Union Pacific Railroad, and that it had in its possession $28,000,000 of the bonds of these branch lines and other bonds which it had received from different counties and cities in aid of the construction of the branch lines; and that at that time, in 1891, the earnings of the Union Pacific road were sufficient to pay the operating expenses, to pay the interest on the prior bonds, the first-mortgage bonds of the road, and furnish a surplus. Yet, by some means, a floating debt of $8,000,000 was created, which turns up in the hands of the officers and directors and representatives of the road, and the bonds and stocks of these branch lines are taken by these officers and placed with Morgan & Co. as security for this floating debt, and notes were issued to the holders of this floating debt came into existence, the consideration received for it, and everything in connection with it, in view of the fact that the road was earning its operating expenses, interest on its bonds, and a surplus besides.

I should like also to have the committee investigate further the proposition now made by these same men to sell these securities, other bonds which it had received from different counties and proposition now made by these same men to sell these securities, these stocks and these bonds, to satisfy the trust notes which they hold, and then, after getting possession of the stocks and bonds, to form a corporation and issue the bonds of this corporation for $10,000;000, to issue $5,000,000 of stock of this new corporation, which is to be divided among the people who take the bonds, and furnish the money as a bonus without paying one cent for it, and thus create a corporation, with a million and a half dollars in these branch lines. They wish to control these branch lines through this corporation and hold a million and a half of dollars in the treasury, so that they can pay assessments, etc., and do those things necessary to manage the property. In other words, they will have a corporation owning and controlling absolutely for the paltry sum of eight and one-half million dollars the stock and bonds amounting to $93,000,000 now the property of the Union Pacific road.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the special order.

The Secretary. A bill (S. 1012) to prevent the desecration of the national flag.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the special order be laid aside temporarily.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GEAR. I will state for the benefit of and in reply to the Senator from South Dakota that if there is a quorum of the committee present during the holidays, all the matter he refers to will be fully investigated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Dakota will

Mr. PETTIGREW. Now, Mr. President, these people propose to get control of this $93,000,000 of stocks and bonds which control the branch lines of the Union Pacific road independent absolutely of the rights and interests of the Government. These stocks and bonds the rights and interests of the Government. These stocks and bonds are worth $35,000,000 to-day upon the market, as I am credibly informed, and yet they are to be taken by the very people who have managed the road, who created this debt and put the road in the hands of a receiver when it was solvent, and so get possession of these lines to the detriment of the interests of the Government in this connection. Then their apparent purpose is—and I hope the committee will look into that question—to divert the business of the branch lines to other roads and thereby make the property upon which the Government holds this security almost worthless.

I say, Mr. President, it seems to methat at this inneture prompt

I say, Mr. President, it seems to me that at this juncture prompt action is necessary in order to prevent the accomplishment of this purpose, which is in the line of the dishonest and corrupt acts of these men through a lifetime.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. Browning, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9753) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for prior years, and for other purposes

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4281) granting a pension to George Johnson, of Lenox, Iowa.

The message further announced that the House requested the Senate to furnish to the House a copy of the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 1261) for the relief of John Kehl and to restore him to his former rating, to replace the original copy of the amendment, which has been lost.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 9753) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for prior years, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

CONSIDERATION OF PENSION BILLS.

Mr. GALLINGER. There are on the Calendar eight pension bills. It will take but a few minutes to consider them; and as these are very deserving cases, I ask unanimous consent that the the bills be now considered.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none. The first pension bill on the Calendar will be proceeded with.

WILLIAM F. JOHNSON.

WILLIAM F. JOHNSON.

The bill (S. 2184) granting a pension to William F. Johnson was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of William F. Johnson, a crippled son of Robert E. Johnson, late of Company E, Eleventh Regiment New Jersey Volunteers, on the pension roll at the rate of $25 per month.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to amend the bill by striking out, in line 7, before the word "dollars," the word "twenty-five" and inserting "twelve."

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill was reported adversals. I will see

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the bill? Mr. GALLINGER. The bill was reported adversely, I will say to the Senator, and was afterwards reconsidered and placed on the Calendar. It is in behalf of the son of a soldier who is en-tirely helpless, helpless from childhood; but it proposes to pension a child at $25, when our rule is $12. I simply move an amendment making it $12.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then the bill ought not to have been reported adversely?

Mr. GALLINGER. That was a mistake, I will say to the Sen-provoke no discussion, and I ask unanimous consent that they may be now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none.

GEORGE W. TAYLOR.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion standing against George W. The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be ead a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MARGARET A. KIDWELL.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now ask that the bills to which I referred while ago may be considered.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

The bill (H. R. 3113) granting a pension to Margaret A. Kidwell was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes well was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension roll, at $12 per month, the name of Margaret A. Kidwell, who was the wife of Henry Kidwell, late private of Company H, Second Regiment Missouri Artillery.

Mr. PEFFER. There was an amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions to strike out certain words. Although the amendment does not appear on the face of the bill, it appears in the report submitted by the committee. In line 6, after the name "Margaret A. Kidwell," I move to strike out "who was the wife" and insert "widow"

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.
The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be proposed for the lieutenant amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETER BUCKLEY.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2355) to correct the military record of Peter Buckley.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported by the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 9, after the date "1861," to strike out "with the pay and emoluments due him at that date "and insert " without pension or other allowances;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the records to be so amended as to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Peter Buckley, late a member of Company E, of the Eleventh Regiment of New York Volunteers, and that an honorable discharge be granted the said Peter Buckley as of the 25th of July, 1861, without pension or other allowances.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think there is an error in the record of the Mr. HAWLEY. I think there is an error in the record of the amendment. I think it was not intended by the committee to strike out the words "with the pay and emoluments due him at that date." The bill gives him an honorable discharge from July 5, 1861. I think it but right to give him what was due him at that time. If those words be stricken out, it will be inflicting a fine of $20 or $30 on the man. I make no objection to the insertion of the words "without pension or other allowances," because what he chiefly cares about, I suppose, is to cure his record. He is a man of excellent standing in the community and has been ever since the war.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator suggest an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee?

Mr. HAWLEY. I suggest that the committee amendment striking out the words "with the pay and emoluments due him at that date" be rejected.

Mr. COCKRELL. If there is any question about that matter, let the whole amendment be disagreed to, and then move the last words as an amendment. The Senator can do that.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then Lask the Senate to disagree to the strikwords as an amendment. The Senator can do that.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I ask the Senate to disagree to the striking out of the words reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the amendment reported by the committee striking out those words will be disagreed to. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. ordered.

Mr. HAWLEY. Now, I move at the end of the bill to insert the words, "without pension or other allowances." The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the Secretary will make the record cor-ectly this time. I think the clerk of the committee made a misrectly this time. I think the cler take in drafting the amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF EDWIN DE LEON.

Mr. PASCO. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2268) for the relief of the legal representatives of Edwin De Leon, deceased, late consul-general of the United States in Egypt.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that $479.11 be paid to the legal representatives of Edwin De Leon, deceased, late consul-general of the United States in Egypt, by the Secretary, being the balance due him on adjustment of his official accounts by the First Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States of America.

Mr. MORGAN. What "Secretary" is referred to there? The bill says "the Secretary." I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the fact that "the Secretary" who is to make the payment is not officially designated. I suppose the Secretary of the Treasury was intended. I do not, however, offer any amendment to the bill.

amendment to the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest that the words "by the Secretary" be stricken out. They are useless.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. PASCO. The bill was reported by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out the words "by the Secretary."

Mr. PASCO.

Mr. PASCO. Very well; let those words be stricken out.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WATER SUPPLY OF THE CITY OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1823) to amend an act approved July 15, 1882, entitled "An act to increase the water supply of the city of Washington, and for other purposes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, but before concluding was interrupted by Mr. TURPIE. I object to the further consideration of the bill.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana inter-poses an objection to the consideration of the bill.

and goes over under objection. SAMUEL BURRELL.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator withdraw his motion until I can call up a bill, which I am sure will not lead to discussion? It is a bill to remove a charge of desertion, which has heretofore passed the Senate. My colleague [Mr. Palmer] was interested in it, but he is not present. in it, but he is not present.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to remove the charge of desertion now on the records of the War Department against Samuel Burrell, late first lieutenant of Company M, Fifth Illinois Cavalry Volunteers, and to grant him an honorable discharge, to date from April 13, 1863; but he shall receive no pay or allowance by virtue of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. WOLCOTT. I renew the motion made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. Mills], that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, December 22, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved. JOHN KEHL.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a privileged resolution, the object of which is to authorize a reengrossment of a bill the engrossed copy of which has been lost.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That H. R. 1261, a bill for the relief of John Kehl and to restore him to his former rating, is hereby ordered to be reengrossed, and that the engrossed copy be delivered to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. LAYTON. I submit another resolution relating to the same subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to request the Senate to furnish to the House a copy of the Senate amendment to H. R. 1261, a bill for the relief of John Kehl and to restore him to his former rating, to replace the original copy of the amendment, which has been lost.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a private pension bill.

The SPEAKER. Subject to objection, the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8053) granting a pension to Alice Gard.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Alice Gard, of Greenfield, Hancock County, Ind., at the rate of $50 per month.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were read, as follows:

In line 7 of the bill, strike out the word "fifty" and insert "twenty;" so as to make the rate of pension $30 per month.

Add to the bill the following:
"As the dependent and permanently blind sister of Mahlon B. Gard, late private of Company K, One hundred and twenty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana, a motion to reconsider

RAILROAD ALIGNMENTS IN INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk, proposing to allow railroads through the Indian Territory to change their alignments.

The bill was read, as follows:

the last vote was laid on the table.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H.R.8850) to amend an act passed at the first session of the Fiftyfourth Congress entitled "An act to grant to railroad companies in Indian Territory additional power to secure depot grounds."

Be it enacted, etc., That the act passed at the first session of the Fiftyfourth Congress entitled "An act to grant to railroad companies in Indian Territory additional power to secure depot grounds" be amended by adding thereto the following:

"SEC. 4. That the power and authority hereby conferred upon such railroad companies may also be exercised in the acquisition of the use of additional ground for right of way between existing stations when found necessary to correct and straighten alignment of constructed road or to reduce grades, subject in all respects to all the terms, limitations, conditions, and payments prescribed by this act: Provided, That where both the abandoned line and such new line shall pass through the lands of any individual occupant, the value of the land embraced in such abandoned right of way shall be deducted from the amount awarded such occupant for the land so taken for such new line: And provided further, That in the construction of such new line such railroad company shall not be permitted or authorized to abandon any existing stations: And provided further, That no such change of alignment shall be regarded as a deviation or in any way impair the rights of the railway company in any particular by reason of any such deviation; but such change of alignment shall be certified to the Secretary of the Interior by the company, with a map showing such change, and the original map of location filed with the Secretary of the Interior shall be deemed to be amended to conform to such change of alignment."

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as fol-

In line 6 strike out all after the word "by" and insert in lieu thereof the words "making section 4 of said act hereafter read as follows."

In line 7, after the word "That," insert as follows:
"All lands acquired under the provisions of this act shall be used for rail-road purposes strictly, and not more than 20 acres of land at any one station shall be acquired hereunder by any one railroad company; nor shall any additional land for station purposes be so acquired which is not contiguous to land already occupied for railroad purposes."

And amend the title by adding after the word "grounds" the words "and to correct alignments."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I should like to ask whether this bill contains any limitation as to the length of time within which this proposed right is to be exercised. For instance, if it is desired to change a grade or straighten a curve at some time within ten or twenty years from now, would the right to do so exist, or is there a limitation of time within which this right must be exercised?

Mr. PENDLETON. I believe the bill, as drawn, embraces no limitation of that kind, and I believe that in the States there is no such limitation in operation. This bill applies to the Indian Territory, as to which all legislation of this sort must come from Congress. Some of these roads were built at an early day, and many of them built hastily. In some cases it is desired to change the alignment of the road between depots, not to change the locations of the depots themselves. If the gentleman from North Dakota regards it as desirable that there be a limit of time within which these changes of alignment must be made, I will cheerfully assent to an amendment to that effect. to an amendment to that effect.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I certainly think that authority of this kind ought not to be granted to be exercised at a distant future time, when that country may be well settled and the lands occupied.

Mr. PENDLETON. That is a question which did not occur to the committee; but I am perfectly willing, and I am sure the committee would be, to have the bill amended in the manner indi-

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota, I have not such an amendment written out now, but I should be very glad to see the bill

Mr. PENDLETON. I will say to the gentleman that I will interpose no objection to the amendment, and will see that the amendment is put on in the Senate. It never occurred to me. I have no objection whatever to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I will be satisfied with that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. LITTLE. I offer an additional amendment to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding the following proviso at the end of line 36, page 3. "Provided, however, That no railroad accepting the benefits of this act, and the act to which it is amendatory, shall charge, demand, or receive a greater rate of passenger fare than 3 cents per mile, under penalty of $100, to be recovered at the instance and for the benefit of the party injured thereby."

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in explanation of the amendment that as I understand the bill it is intended really for the benefit of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company, a road which was built in 1872 through the Indian country. It now charges 5 cents a mile for passenger fare. No other railroad operating in the Territory is authorized to do that. All of road operating in the Territory is authorized to do that. All of the charters granted by Congress since 1872 limit the rate of fare to 3 cents per mile for passengers. It is the purpose of the amendment to limit any railroad company accepting the benefits of this act to a tariff rate of 3 cents a mile for passengers.

This matter was brought up in committee. The committee were not unanimous in favor of the bill; a majority was in favor of the amendment. But it seems to me that this old road, which has had the use of this country since 1872, ought not to be given this additional advantage over the other roads which now enter the Territory.

People who travel along the line of the Missouri, Kansas and Texas road are subjected to this higher rate of fare. Travelers on any other route except that are only required to pay 3 cents. Sir, if a man lives across the line of the Territory and goes on the road, he pays only 3 cents in the Indian country, while the man who resides inside the line pays 5 cents per mile for going the same distance.

This charge is an unjust exaction upon the people of the Indian erritory. This right gives to this railroad company this special

This charge is an unjust exaction upon the people of the Territory. This right gives to this railroad company this special privilege. It is wrong; it is unjust to other companies there, and I hope the House will adopt the amendment.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Arkansas, I wish to say, first, that all charters granted through the Indian Territory must necessarily be granted by Congress. The Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad, it is true, is the only road which has not the 3-cent limitation fare per mile placed on its passenger rate. But the circumstances surrounding the Missouri, Kansas and Texas are exceptional. In the first place it was built, at an earlier period than any other road the first place it was built, at an earlier period than any other road and consequently at a much greater expense. In the next place, it runs through the Indian Territory the entire distance from Kansas to the State of Texas, making a longer distance of unprofitable road for this line to operate than any other road in the Territory. Now, that road does not earn one-half as much per mile in the Indian Territory as it earns in the adjacent States. It is perfectly willing and would be glad to reduce its rates at any time when this Territory is converted into a regular Territory or made a State.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment for a question?

Mr. PENDLETON. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. I would ask the gentleman from Texas if any other road in the Indian country enjoys this privilege?

Mr. PENDLETON. I have already stated that no other road does. I also stated that no other road has such a large number of miles to operate in the Indian Territory as the Missouri, Kansas and Texas. The other roads simply pass through or cut off a corner of that country. The Santa Fe road runs down through Oklahoma and cuts off a small corner of the Chickasaw Nation. The San Francisco road cuts off a small corner of the Choctaw Nation. San Francisco road cuts off a small corner of the Choctaw Nation, but the Missouri, Kansas and Texas runs all the way from Kansas, 250 miles I think, down to Texas.

We perhaps have the power to do what the gentleman wants to have done, but it does not seem to me to be a just exercise of our power.

Again, if, under the decision of the courts, a railroad company has the right to levy and collect enough tolls for the operation of its road and pay interest on its bonds and dividends on its stock, if we reduce the rate for this road in the Indian Territory, in the event that the operation does not pay enough to cover the expenses I have named, then it can go into Kansas or up into Missouri or Texas and raise their schedules on the people there to a sufficient extent to make up for the losses in the Indian Territory.

So, from the standpoint of policy, I do not believe that it is desirable. Mr. Speaker, while I should like to have this question settled on its merits, I will not make any point of order. I believe the amendment is not in order, because not relevant to the bill.

But, as I say, I shall not make the point of order, but simply discuss the question upon its merits.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I desire only to say, in response to the gentleman in charge of this bill, that this railroad has had the the gentieman in charge of this bill, that this railroad has had the benefit of the best traffic through the Indian Territory and the benefits of a trunk line running through that Territory. In all the surrounding States they are allowed to charge, I believe, but 3 cents, and there can be no reason, it strikes me, founded upon justice, why this Indian country and its industrious citizens should be made an exception. This road runs through the richest coal folds in the Indian Territory, through some of its levest territory. be made an exception. This road runs through the richest coal fields in the Indian Territory, through some of its largest towns, and it has an immense traffic from that Territory. I can not conceive any reason why this special privilege should be given to this company. The 'Frisco Railroad, entering at the city of Fort Smith, passes over the Winding Stair Mountain, the roughest route in all the Territory. The road under consideration has a sweep of the prairies, with an inexpensive line, in a great measure. It has had exclusive privileges for years in that country, and now It has had exclusive privileges for years in that country, and now, with a population of 400,000 people, it seems to me that it is inequitable and unjust to them to allow this exorbitant tax, which is more than they charge in any of the adjoining States, and more than any other railroad company in that Territory is allowed to charge. I ask it in justice to the inhabitants of that country that this exaction be removed. What I ask is a right that is accorded to every citizen of that country as far as every other railroad is concerned and so far as the citizens of the States are concerned. This road has enjoyed greater privileges than any other road in the Indian country, and it ought not to object to this simple act of justice toward the people. I ask that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. PENDLETON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered. The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Accordingly, the amendment was rejected.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PENDLETON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

And then, on motion of Mr. BINGHAM, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 9643), with Mr. HEPBURN in

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, before we proceed to the general debate, which for the remainder of the hour is under the control of my colleague [Mr. Brosius], I wish to state that several gentlemen have asked me, last evening and this morning, if unanimous consent could not be given for leave to print their remarks with reference to the several sections of the bill. I would state that it is desired, if possible, to conclude this bill to-day, and it will abbreviate the debate, especially on the civil-service paragraph of the bill, and enable us to close the debate at a much earlier moment, if this leave is granted. I therefore ask unanimous consent for that privilege.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman that that motion

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest to the gentleman that that motion can properly be made only in the House, because the Committee of the Whole, strictly speaking, have no control over the RECORD.

Mr. BINGHAM. I believe it is customary to make the motion in Committee of the Whole, if there is no objection.

Mr. McMILLIN. I shall interpose no objection, but only suggest that in the strict sense the Committee of the Whole has no power over the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the committee can not grant the leave.

Mr. BINGHAM. If that is the opinion of the Chair, I will withhold the request until we are in the House.

Mr. BROSIUS. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee

[Mr. GIBSON].

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to express some opinions in regard to the civil service and to call attention to what seems to me to be some of the defects of that service as now constituted and administered.

I recognize the truth of the proposition that two great national parties are necessary to the welfare, if not to the existence, of our country—two parties large enough in every section of the Republic to put each other on their best behavior. Where there are several parties, there will seldom be a majority of any one party in both Houses of Congress, and seldom a President elected by the people.

TWO GREAT PARTIES NECESSARY.

In such an event the President will be elected by the House of Representatives, and we all know that this could only be effected by combines, and often, perhaps, by the corrupt use of money or of Federal patronage. We have had one President elected by the House, and the cry of "bargain, sale, and corruption" that was raised over that election has not yet ceased its echoings along the raised over that election has not yet ceased its echoings along the political corridors of our history.

We want no repetitions of that experience. Who does not know that our country would not long stand the strain of a Congress composed of three or more parties, neither of which had a majority, and a President elected by "bargain, sale, and corruption" in the House of Representatives? And even if there were no corrupt practices, do we not all know that the charge would be made by the friends of the defeated candidates? And as a result our Presidents would be regarded as mere schemers or tricksters, and having no great party to champion their cause. tricksters, and having no great party to champion their cause, they would be regarded with distrust or contempt by the great body of the people. There would be millions ready to defame them and but few to defend.

And in the absence of a majority party, legislation would be the result of dickers and combines between the various factions, and these combines would often sacrifice some States for the enrichment or glorification of other States, or would cripple or destroy some interests or industries in order to build up or aggrandize other interests or other industries. Selfishness would be the main rule of political action, and the public welfare would seldom be considered.

Mr. Chairman, without great national political parties we can have no Presidents who will command the respect of the whole nation, and we can have no Congresses whose legislation will be satisfactory to a majority of the American people.

THE DANGER OF MINORITY PARTIES.

The secret of the many political revolutions in France and the Spanish-American republics is the want of two great national parties. Indeed, wherever republics have fallen, their fall has been the consequence of struggles between three or more minority parties, and the anarchy, misrule, and dissatisfaction consequent therefrom. Men prefer security to liberty, and when compelled to choose between the two, will always choose security.

Two great national parties being then necessary to the well-being of our country, it is the part of patriotism to encourage the growth of our country, it is the part of patriotism to encourage the growth and nationalization of political parties in the United States; and all legislation and all policies that tend to weaken large parties or to multiply small parties are dangerous to the public welfare, however well meant and however lofty the patriotism that prompts

There should be a fraternity of patriotism in all sections of our country, and among all classes, trades, professions, and sects. As men are now constituted this national fraternity cannot better exist than in connection with great political parties, wherein millions of men living in every section and State of the Union, and representing every great industrial, financial, social, and denominational interest, are banded together in the advocacy of the same great principles of national government and march under the same political banner.

But there can be no such great political parties based upon motives perfectly unselfish. Pure patriotism is an impulse almost divine, and it has filled the bosoms of millions of men both in war and in peace, and has nerved thousands to deeds of heroism and self-sacrifice that shine on the pages of history from the days of Leonidas to those of Maceo. But it must still be remembered that nearly all patriots were partisans first, and through partisanship developed into patriots. Indeed, partisanship is but the portico to the sublime temple of patriotism. [Applause.]

When there is no great principle at stake, when liberty is not openly endangered, when the life or honor of our country is not directly assailed—when, in short, there is no great issue involved, directly assailed-when, in short, there is no great issue involved,

To stir a fever in the blood of age, Or make the infant's sinew strong as steel—no issue that thrills like a bugle's call or a cannon's roar, then there must be other motives to incite men to political action.

MOTIVES OF POLITICAL ACTION.

But great causes of national excitement seldom arise, and it is the duty of statesmanship to provide for the ordinary as well as for the extraordinary. More ships sink at the wharves than founder in the waves, and more nations are shattered in times of peace than are crushed in times of war.

Who, Mr. Chairman, will keep up the organization of our great parties if there are to be no rewards for those who do the work? In the language of St. Paul:

Who goeth a warfare at any time at his own charges? who planteth a vine-yard, and eateth not of the fruit thereof? or who feedeth a flock, and eateth not of the milk of the flock?

And as long as men are selfish, so long must there be selfish And as long as men are sense, so long must there be sense motives to prompt them to political action. A few—but they are very few—will actively participate in politics for the intellectual pleasure it produces. Another few—and these, too, are very few—do what they do in politics for the general good, prompted by the noblest impulses of patriotism. And, Mr. Chairman, I fear that if every element of selfishness is removed from our national politics, the great political parties of our country will break up into fragments and indifference to public questions take the place of vigilance and zeal. There can be no parties without leaders, without captains of tens, and captains of hundreds, and captains of thousands; and who will ordinarily be a captain without some reward or the hope or expectation thereof?

When the life of our country is at stake, or her honor involved, such an issue is enough to cause all true patriots to band themselves under our country's banner; and then it is that the hosts of patriotism

Come as the winds come When forests are rended; Come as the waves come When navies are stranded; and the existence of our country is gloriously maintained or her honor triumphantly vindicated. But in the ordinary days of peace, when "grim-visaged war hath smoothed his wrinkled front," and when there is no great question to stir men to action, then party service becomes irksome, and if there be no reward there is apt to be no work.

Why, Mr. Chairman, even a party as unselfish and patriotic as the Populist party professes to be deigns to condescend to dicker for preferment, place, and power; and their candidate for Vice-President has charged that his party leaders were so keen for office as to sacrifice principle for the sake of power.

It must be admitted, therefore, that a large proportion of politi-

It must be admitted, therefore, that a large proportion of political workers are prompted first by the hope of party victory, and second by the probability of obtaining personally some of the special fruits of that victory. The expectation of reward is a great incentive to action, and the expectation of office is an honorable aspiration, an aspiration that has burned in the hearts of mil-lions of as good men and as patriotic men as ever took interest in public affairs.

ASPIRATION TO OFFICE HONORABLE.

As I look at it, Mr. Chairman, a man has as much right to aspire to a Government clerkship as to a seat in Congress, and it is as honorable to apply for a postmastership as to be a candididate for Senator. This is a country of free and equal men, and we have no privileged class, unless this civil-service law creates one. One man has as many rights as any other man, and while one. One man has as many rights as any other man, and while all can not hold office, yet anyone has the right to seek office, and has the right to hold up his head like a freeman when he puts in his application. [Applause.]

"Then you are for the spoils system," I hear somebody say. No; I am neither for nor against the "spoils system." There are no "spoils." When the American people vote a party into power, that the leaders of that rearry has been voted into that means that the leaders of that party have been voted into power, and that the administration of the Government has been, for a certain term, intrusted to the possession and management for a certain term, intrusted to the possession and management of that party.

Instead of the offices being "spoils," to take possession of them is only discharging the duty imposed by a majority of the people at the ballot box. When the people vote a party into power they expect that party to take charge of all the offices as fast as they become vacant. The meaning of a popular election is that the policy and leaders of the majority party shall control the country for the ensuing term, and that the policy and leaders of the minority party shall go to the rear. And when the time comes wherein there shall be no displacement of the men who hold the offices, then the time will come when a very large part of the interest taken by the people in public affairs will cease, and indifference to political questions will prevail; and when we cease to take adequate interest in the affairs of government, then the days of the Republic will be drawing to a close.

The civil-service law was, no doubt, conceived and voted for by men who believed that they were doing their country a service, but I fear their views were but I fear their views were —— too bright or good For human nature's daily food.

[Laughter.]
Theories that are beautiful to the eye of contemplation are often found to be worthless when put into practice. They are like patents for perpetual motion; and, like elixirs of life and panaceas, they seem perfect until brought into actual use, and then they are either worthless or a downright evil.

The men who devised the civil-service law and put it in operation were moved thereto by special cases of outrageously unfit appointments or grossly unwise removals. The civil-service reformers began by writing down all politics as corrupt and akin to crime, and all politicians as scoundrels.

THE GOSPEL OF MUGWUMPERY.

Acting on this view, they determined that, if they could prevent it, no man who had anything to do with politics should, with their consent, ever hold an office himself or ever help any other person to get an office. They determined to elevate the office-holding class far above the reach of the politicians, and to make them pure, holy, and undefiled, consecrated, like vestal virgins, to the sacred alters of the Government.

sacred altars of the Government.

Some men, very excellent men in their own opinion, seem to think it is rather disreputable for any man to take an active part in politics. They seem to think it a grievous fault for a man to in politics. They seem to think it a grievous fault for a man to be a Democrat, and a still more grievous fault for a man to be a Republican, while it is but little short of high treason for a man to be a Populist. According to these "honorable men" (for they are "all honorable men"), all truly good citizens should disdain to belong to any particular political party, but keep themselves in a position to damn them all as equally bad. In their estimation none of them have any rights any good citizen is bound to respect. According to these "honorable men," the perfect citizen is a mugwump, and their main object seems to be to glorify and transfigure every man who is a mugwump, and to hold mugwumpery up to the gaze of the American world as the beau ideal, the pink of perfect citizenship, and to fill every office with the beauty and the chivalry of mugwumpery.

But men say to me, "Does not the Republican platform favor the civil-service law?" To that I reply that I do not understand the Republican party to be committed to a civil-service law that keeps Democrats in and shuts Republicans out. In the South, after Mr. Cleveland and his Cabinet had turned almost every Republican out of office and put Democrats in their places, he extended the civil service, so as to keep them in, and keep them in during life or good behavior. I want it expressly understood that I am opposed to that sort of civil service, and I believe that the great body of the Republican party is opposed to it, platform or great body of the Republican party is opposed to it, platform or no platform. That is a sort of civil service that says "turkey" to every Democrat and "buzzard" to every Republican. I want no buzzard in mine; Christmas is too near—both Christmases, the church Christmas and the Republican Christmas. [Laughter.]

The civil-service law has been extended by President Cleveland so as to include not only all the officers and clerks in all the Executive Departments in Washington, except those appointed directly by the President himself, but also so as to include all the various officers and clerks in all the various Federal offices throughout the United States, with like exception. Indeed, it may now be said that generally every officer and clerk in Government employ is under the civil service, except officers appointed directly by the President, and fourth-class postmasters, so that the civil service now includes all the men in the Railway Mail Service, all the clerks and mail carriers in the post-offices, all the men employed by the internal-revenue offices and pension agencies, all the surgery of the various pension beards and pension agencies, all the surgery of the various pension beards and pension agencies, all the surgery of the various pension beards and pension agencies. geons of the various pension boards, and nearly every other position in any Government office that can be named where the salary is above that of a common laborer.

I am not one of those who look with horror upon partisanship. Partisanship is close kin to patriotism. A man who does not love his party is not apt to love his country, just as a man who does not love his church is not apt to be a Christian. The greatest heroes the world has ever produced, the noblest partiots that ever graced the cause of human rights, the grandest judges who ever held aloft the scales of impartial justice, and the wisest statesmen who ever laid the foundations of freedom and public prosperity were all nursed in the lap of partisanship; and let us be careful and not allow our zeal to destroy partisanship to so blind us as to cause us to destroy patriotism and weaken the pillars of human liberty. [Applause.]

THE CIVIL SERVICE VS. THE SPOILS SYSTEM.

There are no "spoils" in our politics. The victorious party is charged with the duties of government, and these duties can not be efficiently discharged unless the captains of the party be put into possession of the places of power. The term "spoils" is a misnomer, and should have no place in American political nomenclature. I feel safe in saying that there is as much partisanship, as much favoritism, as much tyrannical partiality now in the vari as much targe Government Departments as there ever was in the so-called "days of the spoils system." And what is worse, this partisanship and this partiality are now more hid from the public gaze, and is generally beyond the reach of redress. There are hundreds of Government employees right here in Washington, under the very shadow of this Capitol, who are cowed by the iron hand of official tyranny, or are converted into servile flatterers by the hope of favor or the fear of official frowns. Many men

Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee, Where thrift may follow fawning.

Although the civil-service law was passed to remove Government clerks from the effects of political prejudice and the power of political influence, yet it is notorious that during the present Democratic Administration hundreds of Republicans have been removed from office or put on lower salaries solely because they were Republicans, and that hundreds of Democrats have been appointed or promoted, not because of their merits, but solely appointed or promoted, not because of their merits, but solely because they were Democrats. And now it is proposed to sanctify all the wrongs done and keep in office all the Democrats thus improperly appointed or promoted.

If some fitting hand would write the secret history of "civil-service reform" as exhibited in our great Departments, there would be disclosures of official oppression, official favoritism, and official injustice toward the clerks there employed that would far exceed any of the stories of wrong under the "spoils system." In former days an oppressed or ill-treated clerk could appeal to his Congressman for redress, but now there is no appeal, and the poor, outraged clerk must suffer in silence or resign.

A TRUE CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

I am in favor of a thorough examination of every Department of the Government to the end that all inefficient employees may be discharged, whether this inefficiency be the result of age, ignohave good reason to believe that there are far more men in the civil service of the Gevernment than are needed for the work to be done, and that this redundancy is largely due to the fact that this civil-service law is supposed to be a shield to protect those in office against removal or even against investigation. hundreds of men in the clerical service who are rendering no service proportionate to their compensation, and who have been drawing unearned salaries for years and years. They are, in fact, mere pensioners, but pensioners who have deserved no pensions and yet are drawing ten times as much as many heroes who shed their blood and ruined their health on the field of battle fighting for the preservation of our country.

There is another wrong in the civil service I wish to see cor-There is another wrong in the civil service I wish to see corrected. Some States have a representation in the civil service far in excess of their just proportion. I believe in equality of rights, equality of duties, equality of burdens, and equality of benefits; and I believe that each State and Territory should have its due numerical proportion of all the offices of the Government, and I will never be content on this subject until full justice is done every State and Territory in the Union. Because a State is near the city of Washington is no reason it should have more than its share of the Federal offices.

If these civil-service "reformers" would bring their great ability to bear on the subject of weeding out the incompetents in the various Departments and thus opening the way for the admission of men of competency and energy, and would see that each State and Territory got its proportion of the offices, I will gladly join hands with them and aid them in these good works. This I consider a true civil-service reform, and is one of the reforms I favor.

I would not have every Federal officeholder kicked out of his office as soon as the successful party came into power; I would not have incompetent men take the place of those who are competent; I would not sacrifice the public welfare for personal gain; I would not treat the officeholders of the defeated party as public enemies, or, at best, as men of doubtful loyalty or questionable integrity or capacity.

NO OFFICES TO BE HELD FOR LIFE.

No. Mr. Chairman; I favor no such doctrines. The principles I favor are these: When a man is appointed to an office, not strictly political, let him be appointed for four years and let it be understood that he shall have the right to hold his office for four years, provided he makes a good officer; and if he can get a reappointprovided he makes a good officer; and it he can get a reappointment let him serve four years longer, and in certain offices, where special acquirements are necessary, I would not object to a third term. But as a rule, I am opposed to any man holding an appointive office for a longer term than eight years. I am opposed to persons being appointed to office for life, or holding office for life, whether they be as eminent as the judges of our Supreme Court of the capture whether they be as eminent as the judges of our supreme court or as humble as the women who wash the floors of the Capitol. "If this be treason, make the most of it," as Patrick Henry said in his great speech for liberty. If it be treason to oppose life tenures of office in republican America, I am ready to meet the charge. [Applause.]

Life tenure of office is not democratic, it is not republican, it is not American, it is not right; it is aristocratic and monarchical. A monarchy is for the benefit of a few; a democracy is for the benefit of a majority; but a republic is for the benefit of all, and I am utterly opposed to any office-holding aristocracy. I draw my sword against it, and will enter into no parley or compromise with it. Rotation in appointive offices is the great political law of America, and not only of America, but of every land where the people rule and true political freedom exists. Life tenure of office may suit monarchical England, but it does not suit republican America. But I am opposed to men filling subordinate clerical offices being removed before their term expires, merely because an opposition party has come into power. I think all of our officials not strictly political should hold office not so much under any party as under the American people. But where an officer has been an active partisan I would favor an abridgment of his term when the opposite party came into power, "for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword."

Nor would I favor the appointment of men not qualified. I have no objection to an examination as to fitness, but I would not make that examination harder than that a superintendent of public instruction must undergo. I would have the examination for an ordinary clerkship to cover reading, writing, spelling, and arithmetic, and I would not care a cent whether he could square the circle, tell where the island of Geefuzz is located, state the length of a millimeter, scan a dithyrambic poem, measure the orbit of a comet, or distinguish and divide

A hair 'twixt south and southwest side.

[Laughter.]

PARTISANSHIP AKIN TO PATRIOTISM

I will say, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that I believe in honorable and patriotic partisanship. Partisanship is but a preparation for patriotism, and they who are partisans when the country is at peace are almost sure to be patriots when danger threatens. A man who has not enough zeal to make a partisan is not apt to have enough to make a patriot. Partisanship is to patriotism what denominationalism is to religion. He whose heart swells with pride at the sight of his party's emblems will feel a grander glow of enthusiasm when he beholds the banner of his country, and he who responds promptly to the call of his party is sure to I will say, in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, that I believe in honand he who responds promptly to the call of his party is sure to spring to the front when the beat of the drum proclaims that the Republic is in peril.

I honor those noble men who make sacrifices for the sake of the party they love. These are the men who are sure to make still greater sacrifices for the sake of their country when the emergreater sacrifices for the sake of sheir country when the emergency requires. All honor to those patriotic partisans who aid in keeping up their party's organization, and who strive through their party to promote the welfare of the whole people. Without them we would not have the liberties we this day enjoy. Without them the cause of human rights would not to-day be so far advanced and so secure in its place. Without them this great Republic would not to-day be that home and fortress of freedom that it is. They are the very sentinels on the watchtowers of liberty, and never will I by any vote or act of mine degrade or dishonor, or even belittle, the noble men who made the great parties of my country in the days that are gone, or who will continue to hold up the party banners in the grand days yet to come.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, yesterday, near the close of the session, an amendment which I had the honor to present was read for information, but it seems not to have been printed in the RECORD. I ask that it be reported again. The amendment was read, as follows:

Mr. BINGHAM. I submit that when the gentleman offered that yesterday, I made my point of order against it, and the understanding then was that it was read simply for information.

Mr. McMILLIN. The Chair so ruled just now.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the purpose of the gentleman now is to simply have it read for the information of the House.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. For information, and to be regarded as pending at such time as it can be offered. Then there can be a chance under the rules for the gentleman from Pennsylvania or other persons to raise objection to it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. The Chair ruled yesterday that no amendment could then be offered for consideration; that i must be offered at the end of the present discussion. I have had it read now for information, but propose at the proper time to offer it for action.

will proceed.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, that the Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, that the American people would welcome and gladly maintain a constitutional nonpartisan civil service, in which continuance in office should be dependent solely on efficiency and good character, I have no doubt. I would vote for such a reform, under proper conditions, had I an opportunity to-day; but that something which has been masquerading for years in the name of civil-service reform is not a reform or a benefit to the Government or the people. It has never been heaven or sincere. It was begun in misrapresentation, it has a reform or a benefit to the Government or the people. It has never been honest or sincere. It was begun in misrepresentation; it has been continued in deceit and calumny. It is a delusion, and lacks little if any of being a stupendous humbug. Without proof, but with bitter denunciation, the strictly legal system of appointment, which had been sustained by the approval of the fathers of the Republic and the practice of every Administration for more than a century, was condemned as a "spoils system," and then and ever since every one who has not approved without question the so-called "civil-service reform" has been stigmatized as a "spoilsman" and denounced by all the followers of the new scheme as an enemy of good government. This has been done without reason or discretion, and with great injustice.

On the other hand, the new plan was at once proclaimed as a

On the other hand, the new rlan was at once proclaimed as a "reform" and as a "merit system," and this without consideration of its practical results. It is a change; but I do not regard it, as enforced, as a reform or as involving any special merit. It has not retained the meritorious clerks in office, neither has it supplied their places with those more meritorious or effi-has it supplied their places with those more meritorious or efficient.

This is shown in part by the official documents I hold in my hand. They are Senate Documents of the Fifty-third Congress, second session, Nos. 105 and 107, and are the reports of the Secretary of the Interior and of the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a Senate resolution of inquiry asking what appointments, dismissals, and other changes had taken place in their several Departments for a given period of time. The report of the Secretary of the Interior covers fourteen months and fifteen days, beginning on the 4th day of March, 1893; and as I read to you the changes which took place in that Department during that brief period I wish you to remember that this is less than one-half the time which has elapsed of the present Administration. During that time it is shown that the changes in the various bureaus of the Interior Department have comprised 817 appointments, 171 the Interior Department have comprised 817 appointments, 171 reinstatements, 893 promotions, 422 reductions, 876 dismissals, and 88 resignations by request. The following classifications are compiled from Executive Document No. 105:

Now, I wish to call attention to the fact that from the State of Georgia alone there were dismissals and resignations by request 6, that there were promotions numbering 48, that there were 5 reductions, and that there were appointments to the number

Mr. BURTON of Missouri. From that State?
Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. From the one State of Georgia, being about one-thirtieth of the whole number of clerks in the Interior Department.

Let us see, because the resolution called for this, how the soldier fared under these changes:

Of the 817 appointments 46 were ex-soldiers. As 140 of the 817 were women, who of course do not count in such calculations, 677 were men, and the soldiers thus formed .068 of the appointments. On the other hand, 185 of the 876 dismissals were soldiers. Taking out the 263 women who were discharged leaves 619 men, and of this number the soldiers formed 30 per cent. Of the 88 requested resignations 9 were handed in by women, leaving 79 men, of whom 32, or 404 per cent, were soldiers.

There were 889 promotions, of which 267 were given to women, thus showing 626 men. Of these 70 were soldiers, giving them a percentage of the promotions of 111. Of the 422 reductions 71 were women and 351 were men. The soldiers reduced aggregated 130, and they formed 37 per cent of the total number of men.

In the matter of reinstatements the ex-soldiers make a better showing. The total number was 171—women 29, men 142. The soldiers were 53, or 37.4

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury covers fourteen months and twelve days, and is nearly if not quite as bad as that of the Secretary of the Interior.

In the Treasury Department, of the 837 appointments 90 had been soldiers. Deducting from the total appointments the 241 women, we have a total of 596 men appointed, only 90, or a little over 15 per cent, of whom were soldiers. On the other hand, deducting the 179 women from the total of 639 removals or requested resignations, 460 men were removed, of whom 126, or over 27 per cent, were soldiers.

There were 538 promotions, 214 of women, leaving 324 men. Of the 324 men promoted, 27, or only 8.3 per cent, were soldiers. Of the 160 persons reduced, 20 were women, leaving 140 men reduced; and of this number 50, or 35.7 per cent, were soldiers. The tables herewith will show the specific classification of all these changes. They are as follows:

Under the present Administration a majority of the soldier clerks in the Executive Departments have been discharged or been reduced in salary, and the reduction in the salary of each of those reduced veterans has usually been to such a grade as to equal or exceed the amount of pension received.

[Here the hammer fell.]

mous consent that I may have ten minutes in which to complete my presentation of this matter.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I would ask my colleague [Mr. Brosius] whether he can not apportion his time so that the gentleman from New Hampshire may have such additional time

Mr. BROSIUS. I have given away all the time that I can afford to give.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well. I do not object to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire.

There was no objection.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, in one of the auditing offices of the Treasury Department in March, 1893, there were about 200 employees, and more than one-fifth of them had rendered service in the Army of the Union. Of those within one year all but about four had been discharged or reduced in salary and every Confederate soldier had been promoted. Comment is

At the beginning of this Administration the Secret Service Division of the Treasury had among its employees about an equal number of Republicans and Democrats. To-day, under the process which I have been describing, there is but one Republican left in the whole Secret Service of the Government. I hold in my hand a letter that I have received from an avowed adherent of the so-called reform, one who has had official knowledge of the Departments and is personally well known to me, but who writes in confidence, so that I can not give the author's name. This letter says:

They found hosts of Democrats in the various Departments who had been kept there through successive Republican Administrations and treated with fairness and generosity. These partisans found voice and activity on the advent of their party and addressed themselves to injuring and defaming their fellow-employees of an opposite political faith.

Never in the history of the Departments have malice, malignity, and envy had such complete sway. Never has such gross, such indecent injustice prevailed. Lending their ears to the slanderer and the traducer, high officials have gratified the personal spite of Democratic employees who had held their places for years by favor of the party and persons they now made haste to overthrow.

And now comes President Cleveland, who, with a stroke of his pen, covers into the classified service all these incompetents and all the men who have wrought this wrong and injustice and have gloried in it.

And, Mr. Chairman, under this system it has been the purpose and the policy of the so-called reformers to prevent information of the changes in the several Departments from going to the people. Clerks have been directed to say nothing about them, and even during the pendency of bills in this House in the last Congress presented by the Dockery Commission, the clerks in the Treasury and other Departments were instructed not to talk to Congressmen or Senators in regard to them or give them any information concerning them, and when I sought information from some officers in them whom I personally knew I was given that as a reply, and the few who did furnish me facts and refreshed my knowledge as to them were compelled to come to me under the cover of night as to them were compelled to come to me under the cover of night that they might maintain their official positions. And this is the system that we are to praise and perpetuate as civil-service reform! Why, gentlemen, years ago I had the honor of serving in one of these Departments. I know what its personnel was from 1865 to these Departments. I know what its personnel was from 1865 to 1874 by actual contact with it, and, by business and other relations with that Department, I have known it ever since, and I tell you that there has never been, in the history of the Treasury Department, a time when it was so well managed, when it had clerks of such ability who so honestly and faithfully discharged their duties, as during that so-called "spoils" time from 1865 to 1875. Then, a person who was in the clerical service of a Department could hold his head up among men, for he was treated as a man

Now, under this so-called reform, except in salaries and in shorter hours of employment, the clerks in the Departments have few, if any, advantages. They are under a surveillance which never before was applied to any department of the Government, and men have been appointed in the Departments, and, upon apand men have been appointed in the Departments, and, upon appointment, have been instructed to spy out their fellow clerks and report anything they could find as an excuse for decapitating Republican clerks. If my friend the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform desires proof on this subject, if he will have an investigation instituted, he shall have it. And, in the face of all these things, has anyone heard that we have a Civil Service Commission? Has anyone heard that any member of the present Commission? Has anyone heard that any member of the present Civil Service Commission has at any time raised his voice, either officially or personally, to condemn these proceedings in the Departments? If anybody has heard it, I would like to have him speak now. On the contrary, the Civil Service Commission has been entirely subservient. The members of that Commission, for some cause or another, have not been willing to stand up in their places and say that any wrong has been committed.

Mr. TERRY. May I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes, sir.

Mr. TERRY. Can you state what proportion of Republicans and what proportion of Democrats are now in the public service of the United States?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not know, but from my an. DAKER of New Hampshire. I do not know, but from my information and observation I should say that there are about two Democrats to one Republican; at least that was the case before the election. There may have been a change since then.

Mr. TERRY. I venture to say you will find to-day that there are not more than 25 per cent of Democrats in the public service of the United States notwithstanding all these things that of the United States, notwithstanding all these things that you say have been done. That is what we do not like. [Laughter.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. There certainly was a much larger proportion last October, and I have no doubt there is at present

Now let me say, Mr. Chairman, that on this subject I desire that there shall be the amplest investigation, and I am prepared, either while I am a member of this House or afterwards, to put myself at the service of the committee and to produce proofs of what I have said here to-day.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman name one Department or bureau of the Government service in which over 50 per cent of the employees are Democrats?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If the gentleman had been listening he would have heard me state just now that the Secret Service of the whole Government has but one Republican left in it at this time. That is one instance.

Mr. McMILLIN. And how many are there in that branch of

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not know the exact number, but it is somewhere between twenty and fifty.

Mr. McMILLIN. And does not the gentleman know that from the time that service was instituted the party in power has held its men there under all Administrations?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. In answer to the gentleman, I say I know that at the close of the Harrison Administration nearly if not quite one-half the persons engaged in that branch of the service were not Republicans. That I know.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Will the gentleman permit me a moment?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If I have the time.
Mr. WELLINGTON. A question was asked a moment ago as to how many persons are employed in the Secret Service.
Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes, sir.
Mr. WELLINGTON. Is not the number thirty-four.
Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not know the exact number.

Mr. WELLINGTON. There are thirty-four persons in that service; and among that number there is one Republican.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Only one Republican—one in thirty-four.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If I can have an extension of time. I will yield, and continue to yield.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the gentleman was granted an extension of time unanimously. I wish to ask him a question in regard to the Weather Bureau. Does he not know that the Chief of the Weather Bureau, appointed by this Administration, is a Republican, and that every chief of division in that Bureau is a Republican except one?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do not know about that; but I do know that a Republican was turned out to put in the gentleman to whom my friend from Tennessee refers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The previous incumbent served out his

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. No; he did not.
Mr. RICHARDSON. He did serve out his term, as I remember, and the present incumbent, a Republican, was appointed.
Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. In the Pension Office about ten-seventeenths of the entire force are Democrats, and in the Fish Commission not even 10 per cent of the present employees are Republicans. When the Government Printing Office was put under the civil-service rules by President Claveland discharges under the civil-service rules by President Cleveland discharges and appointments had been made until about two-thirds of its employees were Democrats. That has been the general practice. Seldom, if ever, has President Cleveland extended those rules until his partisans have secured a large majority of all the offices of value covered by them. His official acts in this direction are not meritorious unless merit consists in keeping as a reformer that which has been secured as a spoilsman. The record of his first Administration is briefly set forth by Mr. Henry C. Lea in an article printed in the New York Independent issued October 18, 1888, and entitled "Mr. Cleveland and civil-service reform." In 1888, and entitled "Mr. Cleveland and civil-service reform." In this article he states that in the two years preceding 1887 Mr. Cleveland made the following removals: Two thousand Presidential postmasters out of a total of 2,359, 40,000 out of 52,699 fourth-class postmasters, 100 out of 111 collectors of customs, all surveyors of customs, all the surveyors-general, all the post-office inspectors in charge, 11 out of 13 superintendents of mints, 84 out of 85 collectors of internal revenue, 65 out of 70 distrist attorneys, 8 out of 11 inspectors of steam vessels, 16 out of 18 pension agents, and 190 out of 224 local land officers.

Under no Administration have the appointments, reductions, and removals of the clerks and employees of the Government been so great or so unprincipled as under the present one, which pro-es to lead the cohorts of reform.

The Civil Service Commission, as I have said, has entered no protest even against this carnival of plunder under the name of purification, and the Commission itself and the organization of its subordinate employees are based upon political preferences and divisions, so that promotions among its employees have been decided by the politics of the several applicants. In short, the Civil Service Commission itself does not in practice enforce the

For such useless service the people are paying by direct appropriation about $150,000 annually, and for further clerical service detailed from the Departments about $25,000 additional. This is detailed from the Departments about $25,000 additional. This is more than four times as much as is appropriated for the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury, $50,000 annually more than the appropriations for the Comptroller of the Currency, and is in excess of the cost of more than half of the offices of the several Departments. But there is another phase of this matter to which I ask your thoughtful attention. Whatever our views in regard to the alleged reform, it is appropriate that we should consider whether or not it is rightfully a part of our governmental system.

The Constitution, Article II, section 2, provides for the appointment of the nonelective officers of the Government. Certain specified officers and all officers not otherwise provided for must be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, but Congress is authorized to vest the appointment of inferior officers in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

The appointment of the clerical force of the several Depart-The appointment of the cierical lords of this ments is vested in the heads of those Departments by law. What is ments is vested in the heads of those Departments by law. What is the true meaning of the Constitution in this matter? What is the proper legal definition of the word "vest" as used in this connection? I apprehend that the definition of Bouvier will be generally accepted. He says it is "to give an immediate fixed right of present or future enjoyment."

Congress having given an immediate fixed right to the heads of the several Departments to appoint the inferior officers of those the several Departments to appoint the interior officers of those Departments, can it by subsequent legislation so modify and limit the power of appointment thus vested as to require those heads of Departments to appoint one of three designated individuals presented to them by a commission or other authority in whom, under the Constitution, Congress can not vest any power of appointment? In other words, has Congress by the act of January 16, 1883, constitutionally deprived the heads of Departments of the power vested in them by section 169 of the Revised Statutes and other statutes of selecting from the seventy millions of our citizens those qualified to perform the clerical service of the Departments and constitutionally required them to limit that power and discretion so that their power of appointment can not extend beyond three persons, and those not of their selection? If Congress can so limit the power of appointment vested in the heads of the Departments, can it authorize or empower a commission, with the approval of the President, to establish and enforce such limi-tations upon constitutional authority? No one will assert that the power of appointment, constitutionally vested by Congress in the power of appointment, constitutionally vested by Congress in the heads of the Departments, did not intentionally and legally vest in them the authority to make the selections necessary to appointment, or that the power to select the appointee under the provisions of the Constitution was not inherent in and a concomitant of the power of appointment. Does it not necessarily follow that any essential limitation of such power is the restriction of a constitutional duty imposed upon them? Hence, when the heads of Departments are required to select their appointees from three persons certified to them by a commission in whom the power of appointment can not be vested under the Constitution, an attempt has been made to degrive them of a part of their constitutional has been made to deprive them of a part of their constitutional authority and confer it upon others, in plain violation of the express provisions of the Constitution.

If this reasoning is sound, then at least a part of section 2 of the act of January 16, 1883, is beyond the power of Congress and nearly all of civil-service Rules VIII, IX, X, XI, and XII, promulgated by the President under date of November 2, 1896, are ultra vires and not binding upon the heads of Departments any further than they may voluntarily accept them.

For convenience I have confined my remarks to the clerical service of the Departments, but like constitutional objection is applicable to the other branches of the service claimed to be under the civil-service law and rules. Evidently Congress may withhold the appointing power from the heads of Departments, but under the Constitution it can vest it only in them or the President or the courts of law, and neither the President nor the courts could constitutionally be restricted in their selections and appointments by the distriction of the Civil Service Commission or any ments by the dictation of the Civil Service Commission or any similar authority.

Congress can not indirectly accomplish that which it is prohibited by the Constitution from doing directly, and as the Civil Service Commission under the Constitution can not be vested with power to appoint any officer of the United States, it can not legally restrict the powers vested by the Constitution in heads of Departments and compel them to accept one of the three persons designated by the Constitution in heads of Departments and compel them to accept one of the three persons designated by the Constitution in heads of Departments and compel them to accept one of the three persons designated by the Constitution in heads of Departments and compel them to accept one of the three persons designated by the Constitution in heads of Departments and compel them to accept one of the three persons designated by the Constitution in heads of Departments and compel them to accept one of the three persons designated by the Constitution in heads of Departments and compel them to accept one of the three persons designated by the Constitution in heads of Departments and compel them to accept one of the three persons designated by the Constitution in heads of Departments and compel them to accept one of the three persons designated by the Constitution in heads of Departments and compel them to accept one of the three persons designated by the Constitution in heads of the three persons designated by the Constitution in heads of the Constitut nated by the Commission.

Again, by section 166 of the Revised Statutes each head of a Department may transfer the clerks in his Department from one Department may transfer the clerks in his Department from one bureau or office of it to another as he may find it necessary and proper to do, but by Rule X of the Civil Service Commission he is prohibited from so doing except by permission of the Commission. Which power is to control the several Departments—the one legally in charge of them or an outside and irresponsible commission not vested with executive functions? This Commission is so grasping and imperious that under its Rule VI the President and each head of an executive department can not appoint more than two private secretaries or confidential clerks without its permission. In the Treasury Department there are a Secretary and three Assistant Secretaries; in the Post-Office Department there are a Postmaster-General and four Assistant Postmasters-General. Under the rule just cited two Assistant Secretaries and three Assistant Postmasters-General must accept their private and confidential clerks at the heads of the Civil Secretaries and three Assistant Postmasters-General must accept their private and confidential clerks at the hands of the Civil Service Commission, which can not, whatever its purpose or pow-ers, recognize or satisfy the personal characteristics of the officers who should be aided in the immediate discharge of their official duties, oftentimes temporarily at least of a confidential character, duties, oftentimes temporarily at least of a confidential character, by those whose capacity is personally known to them and in whose discretion they have the fullest confidence. These are but a few examples of the extra-legal, unwarranted, and unjust assumptions of the so-called civil service reform; yet the time allowed me will not permit a further discussion of them now. But before leaving this part of my subject I remark that the act of 1883 does not specifically repeal any prior statute, and that it is evident that the rules promulgated by the President can not repeal any act of Congress. an act of Congress.

an act of Congress.

This brief statement of the enacted and promulgated limitations upon the constitutional powers vested in heads of the Departments, whether valid or invalid, involves the consideration of some of the necessary conditions attending their execution. If the authority of the head of a Department can be so circumscribed that he must accept for appointment one of three persons certified to him by the Commission concerning whom he has no knowledge, and is not expected to acquire any, except that he or she has answered satisfactorily to the Commission a certain per cent of the academic questions submitted to the candidate, who cent of the academic questions submitted to the candidate, who is responsible for the character and adaptability of the appointee, the Commission which certified him with two others or the constitutional appointing power which blindly chose him rather than either of the other two?

The Treasurer of the United States is a bonded officer responsible for all the millions of dollars received by the Government, sible for all the millions of dollars received by the Government, Under the law and rules now existing he can have no voice or influence in selecting any of those upon whom he must rely for the honest and efficient safe-keeping and disbursement of Government funds. What banker or trust officer would accept the presidency or cashiership of an institution having the custody and investment of even $1,000,000 under like conditions? Is there anywhere any board of directors or trustees who would ask anyone to assume such responsibility, or would any such board attempt to manage any institution of trust if an outside power should absolutely control the selection of its cashier, tellers, and clerks?

Still more, Does any large financial, commercial, or manufacturing house select its employees by competitive academic examination, or does any advocate of the alleged civil-service reform adopt and enforce its theories or example in his private business? Why, then, should the affairs of the nation, unparalleled in detail, variety, and importance, be administered upon a theory not applicable to the business of the citizens by whom our Government "of the people, by the people, and for the people" was established and is maintained?

The true business principles of the best business houses of the country should be applied to the business of the Government, and the heads of Departments charged with the details of administration should, under the usual proper and constitutional limitations naturally imposed by Congress, appoint and be responsible for its clerical and other service performed by the "inferior officers" specified in the Constitution.

The friends of the civil-service law should remember that it contains really no new practice and is based upon no new theory except the competitive idea, with appointments necessarily based thereon and the changes incident thereto.

No clerk shall be appointed in any Department in either of the four classes above designated until he has been examined and found qualified by a board of three examiners, to consist of the chief of the bureau or office into which such clerk is to be appointed and two other clerks to be selected by the head of the Department.

The original statute upon which this section is based was enacted in 1853, thirty years before the Civil Service Commission was established, and from that time was enforced by the heads of Departments, and under it no clerks were appointed who had not suc-cessfully passed an examination and been found properly qualified. That practice was in accord with the Constitution and with com-mon sense, but that the one or the three who in a competitive examination may answer off-hand more of a given number of specifically prepared or technical questions must for that sole reason be appointed to office to the exclusion of those who have demonstrated by their examination that they are by education worthy of appointment is absurd and unjust, and is a limitation upon the natural and political rights of the American citizen.

I have given reasons which lead me to believe that the present law and rules are not in accord with our theory of government or in consonance with the Federal Constitution or productive of good as administered.

I believe that Congress can rightfully provide that the civil-service appointees of the Government shall be examined physically and mentally to ascertain their qualifications for office; that if found qualified they shall be appointed for a term of years; that they shall be eligible to reappointment and not removable during their term of office except for cause based upon specified charges, of which they shall be duly notified, and that when evidence taken to sustain them they may be present in person or by attortaken to sustain them they may be present in person or by attorney and may cross-examine the witnesses and produce evidence in their own behalf. The details of this general plan would not be difficult or expensive.

Now, gentlemen, I have stated facts that are crying wrongs, but my resolution, which goes to one point, and one point only, would permit some of them to be speedily corrected. There is in it nothing of criticism upon the Civil Service Commission or the civil-service idea. It simply provides that six months or six years or some other fixed time of actual efficient service shall be regarded as equal for the purposes of appointment or reappointment to a day's successful examination before the Civil Service Commission resulting in a certificate of eligibility. All that it seeks to accomplish is this: To give to any Administration—the present Administration or any subsequent one-when it is shown conclusively to the head of any Department that a wrong has been committed, even though more than one year has elapsed, the right to correct that wrong and put back the clerk who has been unjustly removed. That, I submit, is in the line of true civil-service reform.

If justice can not be done under the present law and rules, let them be changed until they shall prosper the right. The law certainly is not more sacred than its purpose. If the law or the civil-service idea would be shattered by restoring to their places and duties the worthy and efficient clerks who have been discharged for political reasons only, then the existing system is not entitled to the respect or support of any patriotic citizen, and the claim that it is a "reform" is not only preposterous, but a disgrace to American manhood.

The time of the gentleman has expired. The CHAIRMAN.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. One word more. I do not believe in any system of administration which will permit clerks to be discharged at the mere will of anybody. A true civil-service reform will prevent unjustifiable dismissals as well as protect the Government in appointments. [Applause.]

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty-five minutes.

Mr. BROSIUS. I gave away only thirty minutes, and I would like to know what has become of the other five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not know.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I hope the gentleman will be allowed the additional five minutes.

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not like to be curtailed in my time with out knowing who gets the time that I lose. If somebody else would put it to good use, I would be content; but to have the time entirely lost I would regret.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty minutes.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, before I go into details and subject myself to interrogation, I desire to submit some general reflections on the "merit system" in operation to some extent in our executive civil service. A view of the rise, progress, and present state of that system may not be uninteresting to those who care for economy and efficiency in the public service.

That civil-service reform in the United States owes something That civil-service reform in the United States owes something to the example of the mother country can not be doubted, but it would take me too far afield to go into the genesis of the movement for reform in Great Britain or to trace its historical continuity. It is interesting, however, as showing what great institutions can grow from small beginnings, to note the first awakenings in England to the importance of improving the civil service of the country. Some writers have found in Magna Charta the first civil-service rule in English history. The barons at Runnymede extorted from King John this provision for securing duly qualified officers: officers:

We will not have any justices, constables, or sheriffs but of such as know the law of the realm and mean truly to observe it.

In the reign of Edward II, 1308-1327, it is said there were kept in a tower in London 6 horseshoes and 61 nails, which, by an ancient custom, the sheriffs of London were compelled to count when they were sworn into office. Their ability to do so was regarded as a proof of sufficient education for the office, as only an educated man could count up to 61. In 1388 Parliament passed an act which provided-

That none shall be made officers of the King for any gift, brokerage, favor, or affection, but upon desert.

These are the historical beginnings of civil-service reform among English-speaking people. Centuries of abuses, in which extortionate levies upon the people ministered to the vices and luxuries of the few and the pleasure and power of kings, lords, and nobles were everything, while justice, equality, economy, and the personal worth of the citizen were nothing, were destined to elapse before the appointing power ceased to be the instrument alike of revenge and favor, to reward obsequious servility and compel acquiescence in the will of official despots. There is some humor mingled with the sadness of the reasons given by a custom-house officer for his submission to the royal will, reasons which to this day cause a continuous reign of terror in the unwhich to this day cause a continuous reign of terror in the unclassified civil service of the United States. "I have," he said, "fourteen reasons for obeying His Majesty's command—a wife and thirteen children."

Through all this age-long struggle we have seen the merit system develop according to the law of history. The growth of popular intelligence and official responsibility acquired with lapse of time a progressively increasing influence in the administration of civil service, and a healthier public opinion opposed its vices and abuses with an aggressive resistance which at last was rewarded with a high degree of success.

In accordance with the same law of growth, but possibly under more favorable conditions, has the merit system been evolved in our own country. Few finer compliments have ever been paid the American colonists than that conveyed in the following obser-vation of Lecky, in his History of England in the Eighteenth Century, quoted by Mr. Eaton in his great work on Civil Service in Great Britain:

No nation ever started on its career with a larger proportion of strong character or a higher sense of moral conviction than the English colonies in America. They almost entirely escaped the corruption that so deeply tainted the Government at home.

Strong confirmation of the truth of this observation is found in Strong confirmation of the truth of this observation is found in the high level of political rectitude and official duty and purity which prevailed in the United States for a generation after the Government under the present Constitution went into operation. So little did the fathers anticipate the corruption and abuses which were to grow up in our public service that no definite provisions were made in the Constitution against this source of danger to our institutions. The power of appointment was created, but the power of removal from office was left to inference only.

After a hundred years of experience under our constitutional system, Americans have learned to revere and love that immortal instrument, and to subject their conduct to its express or implied instrument, and to subject their conduct to its express or implied limitations. By habit they look to the organic law of the land for some warrant for the erection of any public institution for the regulation and conduct of public affairs; the more so in this case in view of the magnitude our civil service has attained, employing as it does nearly 180,000 persons in its various branches, and the warm controversy which has for years agitated the country on the vexed question of reform in its administrative methods. In section 2 of Article II of the Constitution, which enumerates the powers of the President, are found these words:

Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments.

Agreeably to this provision Congress has vested the appointment of all inferior officers in the heads of Departments. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that in making appointments the heads of Departments are subject to such restrictions and limitations as Congress may impose in reference to both appointments and removals in advancement of the public interests.* There is thus complete constitutional and legal warrant for such regulation of the civil service of the country as will make it subserve in the highest degree the public welfare.

Singularly enough, however, for more than three-quarters of a century little restrictive legislation was invoked to suppress abuses and promote efficiency in the public service. In the early period of our history so high was the sense of official honor and rectitude and such fidelity to duty was practiced in the conduct of public functions that no legislative coercion was needed.

During the administrations of the first six Presidents those who During the administrations of the first six Presidents those who were charged with the duty of appointing officers performed their duty with a conscientious regard for the public interests, regarding the appointing power as a public trust to be exercised with a scrupulous care for the public welfare. Political opinions or religious affiliations or private motives were not considered in executive appointments. The elevation of mind and lofty patriotism which characterized the statesmen of that period find striking illustration in a letter of Washington to a friend, in which he said:

My friend —— I receive with cordial welcome to my house and welcome to my heart; but with all his good qualities he is not a man of business. His opponent, with all his politics so hostile to me, is a man of business. My private feelings have nothing to do with the case. As George Washington, I would do this man any kindness in my power. As President of the United States, I can do nothing.

So Jefferson, animated by the same high sense of public duty,

Of the thousands of officers, therefore, in the United States, a very few individuals only, probably not twenty, will be removed, and those only for doing what they ought not to have done. I know that in stopping thus short in the career of removal I will give great offense to many of my friends. That torrent has been pressing me heavily and will require all my force to bear up against, but my maxim is flat justitia, ruat cælum.

In 1801, in closing a letter on the subject of appointments, he said:

The only question concerning a candidate shall be, Is he honest, is he capable, is he faithful to the Constitution?

Madison, Monroe, and John Quincy Adams shared with their manson, Monroe, and John Quincy Adams snared with their predecessors these elevated views of public duty with respect to the civil service. All removals from office in those six Administrations were for cause. Washington made 9 removals, John Adams 9, Jefferson 39, Madison 5, Monroe 9, John Quincy Adams 2. These were offices of higher grade which were filled by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. But the purples of removals is the inferior seader were correctly in the number of removals in the inferior grades were correspondingly small, and in all cases for cause. Political influence and personal favor or disfavor are not believed to have had an agency in a single removal or in the selections to fill vacancies.

ORIGIN OF THE SPOILS SYSTEM.

In the Administration of John Quincy Adams, however, the tide of official honor and duty in this particular reached its flood, and the succeeding Administration witnessed the beginning of its ebb. Mr. Jenckes, reporting from the Joint Select Committee on Retrenchment of the House of Representatives in 1868, says:

The change which commenced with the Presidency of General Jackson is too well known to need description. It is summed up in a single phrase, "To the victors belong the spoils." This means that the entire force of the civil service of the United States may be changed for mere political opinon without any regard whatever for qualifications or the meritorious service of the persons in office or the persons seeking office. * * * From that time to the present, nearly forty years, the partisan obligations of the candidate for office have been held to be of more consequence than his qualifications for the place for which he is a candidate, and every administrative department of the Government has been used as an instrument of political or party patronage.

As far as I know, there is no civilized country on the earth in which, on a change of rulers, there is such an inquisition for spoils as we have witnessed in this free Republic. * * * The same party selfishness which drives good men out of office will push bad men in. Political proscription leads necessarily to the filling of offices with incompetent persons, and to a consequent malexecution of official duties.

The reports from time to time made by Congressional commit-tees, covering the period from Jackson to Buchanan, furnish graphic illustrations of the results of the spoils system in our civil service. A few examples will suffice to convey an idea of the extent of the abuses under that system. At the New York custom-house, between 1858 and 1861, the collector removed 389 out of 690 employees. In the three following years the succeeding collector, of a different party, removed 525 out of 702 employees. A later collector in three years removed 830 out of 902 and another later collector in three years removed 830 out of 903, and another in sixteen months removed 510 out of 892, or one removal for every day of his term.

Later times furnish still more striking abuses. In recent times there have been instances in which as many as 96 per cent of the incumbents of offices have been removed on a change of administration. In contrast with this the reports of the Civil Service Commission show that in the last three years in the two great Departments of the Treasury and Interior the removals of those appointed under competitive examinations have not exceeded 2 per cent a year. But in the unclassified service the same revolting spectacle, an "in-and-out" panorama, is still witnessed with every change of administration. Sometimes the incumbents change their politics with such alacrity that they hold their places, notwithstanding the change in party occupancy. It reminds one of the saloon keeper at Winchester during the war. It is said the tide of battle swept back and forth through that little town seventy-six times during the war. When the Union forces were in possession the saloon keeper wore a suit of blue, and when the Confederates returned he changed to a suit of gray, making the changes with such promptitude as not to disclose to the respective combatants the trick he was playing. After the war was over, a neighbor asked him how he managed always to be on the side that was in possession. He replied that the changes of occupancy were pretty fast, but they would have to be d—n quick if they got ahead of him.

THE DAWN OF A BETTER SENTIMENT.

In the midst of this carnival of spoils and reckless indifference to the public welfare there appeared now and then a man who was more sensible than others of the vicious character of the lawless system which Marcy had conceived and Jackson had put into Above the confusion and chaos of the struggle for operation. Above the confusion and chaos of the struggle for spoils at times there arose a voice which, with a fervency of spirit and true devotion to a greatidea which would have done credit to St. Paul, arraigned the existing methods for their failure to promote the public welfare, and proclaimed to the idolators of the spoils system that the dawn of the day of the people's deliverance from its degrading despotism was at hand. The voice was heard, and by degrees heeded, but those who uttered it were reviled and ridiculed, dubbed "snivel" service reformers, and subjected to indignities and proscription. But the voice was not silenced. It grew in volume and power until it awakened the sleening masses grew in volume and power until it awakened the sleeping masses and brought the nation to a realization of the shame it was suffering to pollute the temple of its civil service. The conscience of the Republic was marshaled in aggressive opposition to the sys-tem which made merchandise of office and chattel mongers of those who wore the mantle of high and honorable place. Atlength the better sense of the people prevailed, the principle that public office is a public trust to be administered for the public welfare began to be recognized, and the initial step was taken in the legislation which has improved our civil service and placed it, to some extent at least, on a footing of efficiency and official responsibility. In 1871 a law was passed providing as follows:

The President is authorized to prescribe such regulations for the admission of persons into the civil service of the United States as may best promote efficiency, and ascertain the fitness of each candidate in respect to age, character, knowledge, and ability for the branch of the service he seeks to enter; and for this purpose he may employ suitable persons to conduct such inquiries and may prescribe their duties, and establish regulations for the conduct of persons who may receive appointments in the civil service. (R. S. U. S., section 1753.)

This was in response to a sentiment that had been evolved out of years of agitation, and only acquired force enough to crystallize into legislation after the nation had completed the work of securing the results of the war to save its life, and had a little time to look after the honor of its public service. Some one aptly said that we could not be expected to repair our plumbing, though our people were dying of poisonous gases, while our roof was on fire. Though the enactment had the cordial favor of Grant's Administration, it was but a spasm of legislative virtue and did not last. A recent writer likened it to strawberries sprouted in March. The hearts of our people warmed to the reform but a day and then grew cold again. In 1874 Congress refused the needed appropriation to sustain the work of the commission Grant appointed, and under which the merit system was operated for some time in the departmental service with signal benefit to the service. The President informed Congress that the new methods had "given persons of superior character to the service," and they had developed more energy in the discharge of duty; and in one of his messages he said it would be a source of mortification to himself and those associated with him in enforcing the civil-service rules if Congress should refuse to make the further appropriation which he asked in aid of the work. It was not possible to continue the merit system without an appropriation, and the rules were accordingly suspended by President Grant in 1875. This was disheartening, but it did not suppress the reform. In a few custom-houses and post-offices, notably in New York, where the new system had taken root, it remained. The benefits were so obvious that public pupiling forced the question of reform in our civil service to the opinion forced the question of reform in our civil service to the forefront of politics.

In 1872 both political parties had committed themselves distinctly to the merit system. On June 5 of that year the Republican national convention at Philadelphia declared:

Any system of the civil service under which the subordinate positions of the Government are considered rewards for mere party zeal is fatally demoralizing, and we therefore favor a reform of the system by laws which shall abolish the evils of patronage, and make honesty, efficiency, and fidelity the essential qualifications for public positions, without practically creating a life tenure of office.

On the 9th of July of the same year the Democratic national convention at Baltimore declared in equally unequivocal terms,

The civil service of the Government has become a mere instrument of partisan tyranny and personal ambition and an object of selfish greed. It is a scandal and reproach upon free institutions and breeds a demoralization dangerous to the perpetuity of republican government. We therefore regard a thorough reform of the civil service as one of the most pressing necessities of the hour: that honesty, capacity, and fidelity constitute the only valid claim to public employment; that the offices of the Government cease to be a matter of arbitrary favoritism and patromate, and that public station become again a post of honor. To this end it is imperatively required that no President shall be a candidate for reelection.

From that time forward no political party dared go before the people without a distinct recognition in its platform of the claims of civil-service reform. The two great parties vied with each other in their professions of devotion to the reform—albeit they were suspected of being most celestial in their professions, when they were quite terrestrial in their performances. But to this day no national platform has appeared without a plank favoring civilservice reform.

THE PENDLETON ACT.

In January, 1883, the results of the agitation which thoughtful and earnest men had kept up were crystallized in what is known as the Pendleton Act, drawn, I believe, by Dorman B. Eaton, whom Grant had appointed on the first Civil Service Commission with George W. Curtis and others, and who was an earnest, able, and sincere civil-service reformer, and was introduced into the Senate by Senator Pendleton, and hence bore his name. After a long debate it passed the Senate with but 5 votes against it. In the House it was not debated at all, but passed under a suspension of the rules by more than a two-thirds vote. Under this act the merit system has been enforced in our civil service for thirteen years to an annually increasing extent. Under its provisions custom-houses and post-offices, as they reach in their growth a certom-houses and post-offices, as they reach in their growth a certain number of employees, come automatically under the law and the rules of the merit system. Then, too, periodically, whenever the President is disposed, another branch of the service is placed under the law, until by automatic growth and Executive extension the number of employees in the classified competitive service has grown from about 14,500 in 1883 to 87,406 at this time, and embraces the following branches of the service: Departmental, Government Printing, Indian, Railway Mail, Customs, Postal, and Internal Revenue. 87,406

PROGRESS OF REFORM.

Total in classified service.....

It thus appears that the merit system in our civil service has made gratifying progress. That it has been retarded by the obstructive hostility of its enemies goes without saying. That it has been scandalized by groundless complaints is plain enough—complaints as foolish and childish as Sydney Smith's complaint of the solar system when he said to his friend Jeffrey:

D—n the solar system; bad light, planets too remote; pestered with comets, feeble contrivance; could make a better with ease.

That its efficiency has fallen short of what it might have been but for the indifference if not faithlessness of officials charged with the duty of carrying it into effect is too obvious to need to be mentioned. The success of any branch of the system depends upon the fidelity of those whose duty it is to execute it, and the success of the whole system depends upon the fidelity with which the President, the Civil Service Commissioners, and the appointing officers carry out its provisions. To have an ideal execution of the law you must have ideal men, whom you can not obtain. There are still too many who render the merit system a good deal of lip service, whose hearts are lightly troubled with devotion to its claims, and who stumble at the actual application of its principles in the administration of office. They remind one of the story Gladstone tells of Lord Melbourne. The latter was seen coming from church one Sabbath in great excitement. Meeting a friend, he exclaimed:

It is too bad. I have always been a supporter of the church and have always upheld the clergy; and it is really too bad to have to listen to a sermon like that I heard this morning. Why, the preacher actually insisted upon applying religion to a man's private life.

But withal, it has been for thirteen years in a state of progressive efficiency, yielding new fruit each year and deepening its hold upon popular respect as its benefits become more fully

THE SPOILS SYSTEM.

Now let me invite your attention to what the merit system is, and to distinguish it sharply from what is known by the very apt designation of "the spoils system." The two systems stand for opposite theories of politics and official duty and responsibility. The idea underlying the spoils system was clearly expressed by Senator Marcy in that famous utterance in the United States Senate, that "There is nothing wrong in the rule that to the victor belongs the spoils of the enemy." His contention was that the political party that won the victory was entitled to enjoy the fruits of it, which meant that all the employees of the Government should be dismissed on the change of Administration and ment should be dismissed on the change of Administration and the places filled by adherents of the winning party. To carry out this theory rotation in office was inaugurated and was advo-cated by some statesmen as a cardinal political principle, a practical necessity in party administration to reward party work-ers and political friends and to wreak revenge upon their adver-

But rotation in office is a dream. It has never gotten further in its development than succession in office, and that sometimes has been very rapid. George William Curtis said:

The doctrine of rotation in office implies that merit should not be considered. It treats the public service as a huge soup house, in which needy citizens are to take turns at the table, and they must not grumble when they are told to move on.

The system is predicated upon the false and demoralizing ideas-That a political party is a body of politicians associated in an affort to capture the Government and appropriate the honors and profits of the public service to the use of themselves. 2. That political campaigns are battles for the conquest of spoils with which to reward leaders, fighters, and workers. 3. That regard for principles, love of country, and obligation to duty are to be professed but not practiced to the prejudice of party ends. 4. That fidelity and work for the party are qualifications for office paramount to personal worth and merit.

Of course I do not go to the length of saying that appointing officers give no attention to qualifications, for they do, and the better and more conscientious the man the better will his appointments be. Cromwell improved the civil service of England greatly, not because his system was not despotic, for no ruler was ever more so, but because he had higher conceptions of duty and of what the civil service ought to be than his predecessors. He mixed his religion and his politics and produced a unique combination which was calculated to advance the public welfare. He appointed according to his own will, but he put conscience into the selection, as he did in everything else, and good appointments were the result. Experience, however, in our time has clearly shown that the best intentions are likely to be overcome by the importunities of those to whom the appointing officer is under obligation, and this result is advanced by the influence of our democratic American optimism that holds one man as good as another. John Stuart Mill once wrote Mr. Motley that he deplored the fatal belief of the American public that anybody was fit for anything. This idea would be fatal to civil-service reform, as it would be fatal to private business and to the great manufacturing and transportation managements of the country. At all events it is obvious that the way to place the flower At all events, it is obvious that the way to pluck the flower, safety, from the nettle, danger, in this particular is to release the appointing officer from the duress under which he is placed by his

The fallacy into which many good people have fallen, and which found eloquent advocates in great statesmen, from Burr to Marcy, and from Jackson to Tweed and Conkling, finds its latest and most and from Jackson to Tweed and Conking, finds its latest and most striking crystallization in the famous reply of Judge Barnard on his trial for the corrupt use of judicial patronage: "I won this office and its patronage is mine." But no intellectual greatness or political distinction can redeem or powers of eloquence sanctify a system so vicious in principle and demoralizing in practice as the spoils system. Some years ago, at a dinner in New York, Professor Huxley asked Senator Conkling what he thought of the intellection of the professor system. civil-service reform. The Senator launched into an eloquent civil-service reform. The Senator launched into an eloquent defense of the spoils system. Huxley was asked what he thought of it. He replied that it was the most eloquent defense he had ever heard of a perfectly indefensible thing.

It hardly needs to be pointed out how in practice this system vitiates the relation between the legislative and executive departments of the Government. Under the Constitution no encroachment of one upon the other is contemplated. Yet, under the perverted practice which has long been in vogue, the executive function is, to a large extent, usurped by members of Congress, who become purveyors of patronage, whose importunities for favors for their constituents can not easily be resisted by the average Executive. The result has been that the lives of both President and Congressmen have been made miserable. President dent and Congressmen have been made miserable. President Lincoln once said he never went to sleep without looking under the bed to see if a certain Senator was there in pursuit of an office. At another time, when he was sore distressed by these Congressional importunities, he said he could not get time to consider the Southern question. "I am," said he, "like a man so busy in letting rooms in one end of his house that he has not time to put out the fire in the other end." Secretary Windom said:

In the last one hundred days a few thousand men in search of office have taken nine-tenths of the time of the President and his Cabinet.

But it perverts also the relations between the Representatives and their constituents. In many districts the real question upon which the election of a member of Congress turned was not whether he could represent the highest interest of his district and the country at large, but, Could he make the necessary alliances to secure the requisite offices to meet pressing demands; could he command favors enough to secure the caucus or patronage enough to carry the convention? Dr. Andrew D. White tells of a member of Congress with whom he conversed on an important measure. He asked the Congressman why he did not make a great speech on the subject, educate the country, and extend his own fame. The oppressed statesman, holding out a bundle of letters, replied: "I can not do it, sir. I have not the time. Here are fifty unanswered letters from my constituents asking me to get offices for Contrast this situation with that of a statesman in England under the superb civil-service system of Great Britain. A member of Parliament a few years ago, speaking of their civil service, said he represented one of the most important districts in the United Kingdom, but he thanked Heaven that he was powerless as to the appointment of the pettiest tidewaiter in the Empire. It was the boast of Gladstone that the only office in his gift was that of his own private secretary. It has been said that the number of offices which go to the victors as spoils at a Parliamentary election in Great Britain does not exceed thirty.

THE MERIT SYSTEM.

The merit system, on the other hand, stands for a body of ideas which are the extreme opposite of those I have just considered.

1. It recognizes the public welfare as the supreme good.

2. It insists everywhere and at all times, in politics and official life, that merit is the paramount test of fitness for the public

3. That public office is a public trust, to be administered in advancement of the public good—and never to be filled by mere favor or bestowed as spoils.

4. That the practice of dispensing office on account of political opinions or affiliations is a demoralizing and despotic use of official power and detrimental to the public service.

5. That patriotism as well as good morals condemns the use of the power of appointment and removal for mere selfish and partisan ends, as they condemn the use of public money for personal ends.

These are the cardinal principles which the civil-service law and the rules under it are the means of applying in the administration of our civil service. No patriot can withhold the homage due to sound principle and patriotic purpose, justice, and purity in political and official life by omitting to extol a system which has for its object the dignity of man, official rectitude, the elevation of the public service, and the expression in our public life of the highest reason and best conscience of our people.

Whatever view may have prevailed when the "merit" system was first introduced, I hazard nothing in saying that it has long since passed the experimental stage. It is now firmly rooted in public favor, and is perhaps as well established as an administrative policy as any other institution of our Government. Its success in bettering the condition of our civil service deserves the wide acceptance it has received and the high esteem in which it is held. The people of the United States are practically united in while acceptance it has received and the fight esteem in which it is held. The people of the United States are practically united in the conviction that public office is a public trust; that it is to be filled for the benefit of the people rather than of the incumbent; that personal character and capacity constitute the best title to public place; that the merit system is based upon the American principle of the right of the people to have the worthiest and best-qualified citizens to serve them, and that every citizen has the right to compete for the honor of civic preferment if he possesses the qualifications; that every office bestowed as patronage or spoils, without regard to fitness, is so much taken from better qualified citizens, whose services the Government has a right to enjoy; that the portals of the public service should be opened to no man who can not give the open sesame of "tested merit."

In other words, the people are now practically united in regarding as axiomatic these propositions:

1. That the highest claims upon preferment in our civil establishment are the character and capacity that best qualify a person for the discharge of duties of the office.

That common justice requires the application of a fair public test for ascertaining those qualifications.

3. That he who represents the highest evidence of fitness has morally, and should have legally, the right to the office.

These principles, which have been accepted as sound and salutary by all political parties in our recent history, and are believed to be founded in natural justice, are promotive of wise and economic administration and conducive to the general welfare. And the occasional—I might say periodical—outcry against the merit system is a survival from a time and a state of public opinion which has long since passed and will not be likely to return to plagne the has long since passed and will not be likely to return to plague the people.

BENEFITS OF THE SYSTEM.

The benefits which the merit system confers upon the people are direct and indirect. The direct benefits are those derived from securing for Government employment the most reliable and effi-cient service. The indirect benefits are those derived from the stimulus and encouragement given to the general education of the people; the industry and achievement which come from generous rivalry between aspirants for the honor of civic places, which are the trophies of merit alone; and the incentive to exertion which produces character and attainments, moral independence, and that manly thought and action which give citizens influence and make them men of light and leading in the community.

It saves young men who desire Government employment from the degradation of servility to political masters and the humilia-tion of beggars for patronage from those who have the power to bestow it. It opens the doors of the public service to the personal worth and intelligence of the nation on the only terms upon which an honorable man should be required to seek civic preferment, the terms of winning it by honorable competition for the prize that rewards success in the tournament of merit. It makes it possible for young men who are too humble to command influence and too for young men who are too humble to command influence and too manly and independent to ask favors, and who are qualified for the public service, to win places without the sacrifice of self-respect and manhood. Nor have these advantages been unappreciated by young men and women of the country—they have been availed of to a surprising extent. In 1894, 37,379 persons were examined for all branches of the service; 22,131 passed the merit test successfully and were placed upon the eligible list, and 4,372 were appointed to places in the civil service of their country.

And furthermore to the honor of our public schools the statis-

And, furthermore, to the honor of our public schools, the statistics of the Commission show that the great majority—more than 80 per cent—of those appointed to positions from the eligible lists have received only a common or high school education. College graduates do not comprise more than one-sixth of those who enter the Government service through civil-service examinations. It is also interesting to note that the persons who are appointed to the service are not fresh from their books, as the average age of the appointees to the service is 28 years, a period of life which is several years beyond the time of leaving school.

Then, again, the open public competition which closes the doors Then, again, the open public competition which closes the doors to patronage and favoritism in appointments, destroys the motives for removals, for vacancies can not be filled by chosen favorites; but only by those whom the chances of battle in an open contest of merit assign to the place. In such case there remains little inducement to increase places beyond the necessities of the service, for they can not be filled by the personal selection of the appointing officer, but by those certified from the head of an eligible list. And, moreover, as General Grant wisely said, it is much easier to remove the unworthy persons who come in through competition, for they are without political influence to keep them in, which is not the least of the vices of the spoils system.

It is the uniform testimony of the chiefs of bureaus and divisions, as well as the heads of Executive Departments, that appointees coming in under the civil-service rule are more efficient than those appointed under the old system, that abuses under the former system have been corrected, that the moral tone of the public service has been elevated and the service made more economical and businesslike.

In the Post-Office Department a rule has been promulgated in this Administration that no carrier shall be removed except for cause upon written charges filed with the Post-Office Department, and of which the carrier shall have full notice and an opportunity to make defense. Gratifying evidence of the high ground taken by the present Postmaster-General is found in his address before the national convention of letter carriers in this city in September last. He there said:

No one rejoices more than I do, both on principle and on the lower plane of selfish convenience, that every free-delivery post-office in the country is now under civil-service rules; that the gateway to employment therein is no longer partisan influence, but the free and open road of personal merit, and that the tenure of that employment no longer depends upon anything else than individual merit and individual fidelity.

He has also followed the lead of his predecessor in the previous Administration, and recommended a merit tenure for three of the Assistant Postmasters-General. This may well be regarded as indicating the trend of sentiment among those occupying the most conspicuous positions in the public service.

THE PRESENT STATE OF THE LAW.

The present state of the lawis in many respects satisfactory, but The provisions for safeguarding the service against not in all. The provisions for safeguarding the service against political influences might be improved, though, as far as admissions to the service are concerned, they are quite ample. The law does not allow more than two of the Civil Service Commissioners to be adherents of the same party.

It provides for a system of examinations to test fitness, which excludes the possibility of political discriminations, because the identity of the persons is not known to the examiners who determine the persons and selections are made according to grade mine the percentages, and selections are made according to grade as they stand on the eligible list.

No person shall be removed or otherwise prejudiced for not con-tributing to any political fund or not rendering any political service.

No person in the service has a right to use his official authority or influence to coerce the political action of anyone.

No recommendation of any applicant for office which may be given by any Senator or Member of the House of Representatives, except as to the character or residence of the applicant, shall be received or considered by any person concerned in making the examinations or appointments.

And it is the duty of all officers of the Government, to which the law and rules of the civil service shall relate, to aid in all proper ways in carrying said law and rules into effect.

It will thus be seen that if all officers charged with duties under the law perform their duty, the civil service will enjoy absolute immunity from discrimination on political grounds as far as admissions to the service are concerned.

After their admissions a different rule prevails. Promotions, removals, and reductions, singularly enough, have not been excepting to a limited extentamenable to law. To correct this defect, I introduced a bill early in the first session of this Congress making it a penal offense to willfully discriminate in favor of or against any eligible for appointment to or any employee in the classified civil service of the Government in the matter of promotions, reductions, or dismissals on the ground of their political opinions or affiliations. That bill was reported favorably from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service and is now on the Calendar. Happily, the necessity for the measure is to some extent superseded by on Reform in the CNH Service and is how on the Calendar. Happily, the necessity for the measure is to some extent superseded by the rules recently promulgated, which place greater restrictions upon official liberty in this respect, and if enforced with fidelity will greatly improve the system. Heretofore the Departments have regulated the discipline of employees according to their own rules; and in the matter of removals, promotions, and reductions the "spoils system" had a big pull. It has been thought by many better not to place restrictions upon the appointing power in relation to removals, because the good of the service requires removals to be made at times, and some discretion must be lodged in those who are responsible for the service.

The complaints that have been mostly made—and they are numerous and in many instances with apparent warrant—relate to this aspect of the service. It is not possible, perhaps, to eliminate the personal factor entirely from the treatment of employees, and there is much force in the contention that the liability to abuse of the power of removal is minimized by the fact that there is no guaranty that a vacancy will be filled by a person more agreeable, politically and personally, than the one removed. Still, I am of the opinion that some restriction should be placed upon removals, for abuses are believed to be practiced in some instances to the prejudice of faithful employees by their revenue or reduction without opinion that some restriction should be placed upon removals, for abuses are believed to be practiced in some instances to the prejudice of faithful employees by their removal or reduction without justifiable cause. This can only be prevented by making such abuses penal offenses, and the new rules do this. As the law has been, there was no redress for any employee who believed injustice had been done him in these respects. He complained and his outcry of injustice went up and down the land, bringing scandal and discredit upon the service and upon the heads of Departments involved, with no means available of establishing the truth of the accusation or vindicating the appointing officers against the aspersions cast upon their official duty and honor.

There is another defect in the law which I would correct. I

There is another defect in the law which I would correct. I would extend the preference given to a limited number of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the late war by section 1754 of the Revised Statutes to all honorably discharged soldiers and sailors. The limitations upon this preference are not really understood. The law says:

Persons discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such offices.

While section 2, Rule VII, of the civil-service rules provides

The names of all competitors whose claims to preference under the provisions of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes have been allowed by the Commission, and who attain an average of 65 or over shall be placed in the order of their average percentages at the head of the proper register of the eligibles.

While section 3 of Rule VII provides as follows:

For filling vacancies in positions for which competitive tests are not practicable, persons who served in the military or naval service of the United States in the late war of the rebellion and were honorably discharged therefrom shall be placed at the head of the proper register in the order of their fulfillment of said requirements.

This is all right as far as it goes, but it ought to go further. Very few of the soldiers of the late war who were honorably dis-Very few of the soldiers of the late war who were honorably discharged thirty-odd years ago by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty are now surviving to avail themselves of the advantage of this provision of the law. There are, however, a large number of honorably discharged soldiers who have since their discharge become in some degree disabled by reason of wounds or sickness incurred while in the service who are capable of performing the duties of many of the offices under the civil-service law, but who are not entitled to any preference over others under that law. With a view to correcting this defect I introduced in the first session of this Congress a bill to amend existing law so as to extend this preference to all honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of the war of the rebellion and the widows of such honorably discharged persons, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary to discharge the duties of such offices. That bill was favorably reported by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and reported by the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and is now on the Calendar.

Under existing law there were in the year 1894 but 14 of the preferred class of soldiers placed upon the eligible list for the entire departmental service of the United States, and only 10 secured appointments. In the year 1893, 15 were placed on the eligible list and 13 received appointments. From June 30, 1894, to January 1, 1896, only 4 were appointed. After the lapse of thirty years from the close of the war, and in view of the widely prevailing sense of gratitude and generosity toward the surviving defenders of the Union, it is believed that the extension of the preference as I have suggested would be an act of instice which preference as I have suggested would be an act of justice which the people of the United States, in grateful recognition of the services and sacrifices of those who served in the Army and Navy in the war for the Union, would highly commend. It is believed that the average age of the surviving Union soldiers is about 60 years, while the average age of those passing examinations is about 27 years. It is therefore apparent that the number of this class who would pass the merit test under our civil-service rules would be limited. The extension of the preference to the widows of soldiers and sailors who were honorably discharged from the service of the United States would be a recognition of a meritorious class to when the patriotic women of America are quite willing to concede the slight advantage which will inure to them through the proposed preference,

With some modifications with a view to the improvements I have suggested, the law would be about as good as we can hope to have it; and if those intrusted to carry it into effect are as good as the law we will soon have a civil service in the United States in which faithful employees in the great Government workshops, where 175,000 people are earning their living and serving the public, will be under the law secure in their places as long as they are faithful and efficient, and into which no passport but merit and personal worth can gain admission.

Mr. Chairman, it was my original intent to lay before the Committee of the Whole some information relating to the present state of the executive service of the United States, with a view to meeting some inquiries which are being made by members of the House relating to that service. I shall not be able to do that fully in the time I occupy the floor to-day; and I shall therefore at the proper time ask consent to so extend my remarks as will enable me to place upon the tables of members some statements and figures which will reveal the condition of the civil service to some extent at this time and answer some of the inquiries which members are making.

EFFICIENCY OF SERVICE.

I hold in my hand the replies of the chiefs of the various Departments of the Government to a resolution passed by this House at the last session, asking for certain information relating to the state of efficiency among the employees of the service. I desire to give to the committee a statement of the result of those replies, to show as well as such a statement can show the state of efficiency in the service. Every chief in the entire civil service was requested to state how many employees in his Department or bureau were below the average standard of efficiency; and I have the happiness to be able to say that it appears from the reports from all the bureaus and Departments of the Government that but thirty-three servants in the employ of the Government at the time these answers were made were below the average standard of efficiency.

Mr. ANDERSON. Do I understand the gentleman to say that in all the Departments the inefficient were found to number only thirty-three?

Mr. BROSIUS. Only thirty-three, as reported by the heads of the various bureaus of the Government.

Mr. BOWERS. What time was that response made?

Mr. BROSIUS. At the close of the last session of Congress. The resolution of inquiry was passed on the last day of January, and the replies covered the period from that to the last of April.

Mr. BOWERS. As late as that?

Mr. BROSIUS. That is about the time.

Mr. BOWERS. Will the gentleman allow me a half minute? Mr. BROSIUS. I prefer not to be interrupted, if the gentleman will allow me.

It will be easily seen, Mr. Chairman, by the members of the committee that the character of the statement that I am making, and am about to make, would naturally elicit a great number of inquiries, and my time would be entirely consumed by somebody

I have answered the gentleman from Tennessee that the total number of employees as shown by these reports of the heads of the bureaus of the Government is thirty-three inefficients. Mr. ANDERSON. I think I can find that many in one single

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, that may be. This statement comes to Congress from the heads of the various bureaus and Departments of the Government as to the average standard of efficiency of the employees.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question? Mr. BROSIUS. Now, if my friend from Tennessee will desist

I only want to ask one, and a short one. US. I want to make some observations myself on the service, and unless my time is extended indefinitely I shall be compelled to decline to answer any inquiry

Mr. COX. I have a very pertinent question.
Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman from Tennessee has a very interesting question. He looks like it. [Laughter.]
Mr. BROSIUS. I have no doubt of that fact. He always has interesting questions and they generally lead to various other questions, as they suggest thought in others.

In the Treasury Department the report shows 22 employees below the average standard of efficiency, of which number 8 are inefficient on account of age, one being 57 years of age, one 63, one 68, one 69, one 70, one 77, one 82, and one 84.

In the Department of Labor there were 2; and the inefficiency in their cases arose from ill health.

In the Post-Office Department there were 9 reported, 6 females and 3 males, and age was the cause of the inefficiency of 5 and mental infirmity of 2.

I thought it proper, Mr. Chairman, to make this statement for the information of the committee and the House. If any relia-bility attaches to these replies from the chiefs and heads of the bureaus and Departments of the Government, it certainly reveals a very gratifying and satisfactory state of the service so far as that is concerned. that is concerned.

Now, in relation to the present state of the civil service, we have, in round numbers, 175,000 employees in the various Departments and bureaus of the Government. We are paying them every year, in round numbers, about one hundred millions of dollars. You can easily see the importance attaching to the subject when you contemplate the money taken from the pockets of the people to pay these servants.

In the service of the Government to-day there are in the aggregate in the departmental service 58,548 employees; of this number, there are in the classified service 46,454, and we pay them $48,130,017 a year. In the Post-Office Department there are 104,811 all told, and in the classified service the number is 26,816. We pay that Department $38,665,025. In the Government Printing Office there are 2,852 employees, all of whom but 36 are in the classified service, and we pay them $2,509,830. In the custom-house service there are 5,103 employees in the aggregate, and 4,545 of them are in the classified service. We pay them $66,333,027 per annum. In the Internal-Revenue Department of the Government there are 3,282 employees, and 3,168 of them are in the classified service. We pay them $3,298,266 a year: making a total of employees in the civil service of 174,596, and in the classified service, 83,299, the whole of which costs the people $98,936,167.

These figures are approximately correct, but I will print with my remarks a tabulated statement containing the correct figures. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I rejoice more than I can express to hear honorable members on this floor, with a devotion to a great principle and a fervency of spirit, I may say, that would do credit to the apostle to the Gentiles, arraigning the remnant of the spoils system that yet lingers in the executive civil service of the United States. I agree with what they say to a large extent. I unite with my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. Baker] in condemning the remnant of that iniquity that remains in the civil service of the country, and that he has been lashing with appropriate vigor, thinking he was arraigning the reformed civil service of the country; in other words, the merit system, which in the past only covered a part of the executive civil service.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman permit

Mr. BROSIUS. My friend knows I have but a few minutes. Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. You told what I thought; not what I said.

Mr. BROSIUS. I should be glad to yield to interruptions if I had the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] declines to be interrupted.

Mr. BROSIUS. The complaints which our friends make against the civil service are shown by what they themselves say not to be complaints against the merit system, but against the spoils system which remains.
Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. That is so.

Mr. BROSIUS. And all the employees who have been removed from office, according to the report cited by my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. Baker], taken from the report of 1894, were removed under the spoils system, and not under the classified civil service of the United States. [Applause.] There is no way that they could be removed, if they were under the classified system, unless you assume that a man does a thing without a motive. Every vacancy made under the classified service of this Government must be filled, not by the selection of the appointing officer, but from the head of an eligible list according to grade, which was fixed and established without the possibility of political preference. For all who understand anything about the civil service of this country know that those men are placed on that list after an examination under rules, which preclude the possibility of political preference, because the identity of the applicant examined is not known to those who conduct the examinations, for the applicants and determine the applicant's release the identity of the applicant examined is not known to those who conduct the examinations, fix the percentages, and determine the applicant's place on the eligible list.

This absolutely excludes the possibility of any political discrimination. The civil-service rules of this country, so far as they apply to the service, sufficiently guard admissions to the service against the influence of politics. But after they get into the service against the influence of politics. But after they get into the service, it is true that the merit system ceases to have the same effectiveness, because not applicable, or at least not enforced, as I think it ought to be. And if any member of the committee has an amendment to offer to make it apply more effectually to employees after they have been admitted into the service, I think I shall support such an amendment. Of course the rules adopted under the executive order recently propagated do this to every under the executive order recently promulgated do this to some extent.

There is also a mode of shifting employees in the service so as to There is also a mode of shifting employees in the service so as to reduce and promote which operates very unjustly when used to favor one party at the expense of another. It is claimed, with what truth I do not know, that this abuse has been carried on to a vicious extent in this administration. There is a vice also in the present classification of employees that ought to be corrected. Any one who visits the departments can see a number of clerks sitting side by side, all doing the same kind of work while their salaries may vary several hundred dollars. This inequality ought not to be tolerated.

But there has always been a practical difficulty after employees are admitted. What is the best mode of regulating their discipline with a view to securing the least of the worst and the most of the best results is not by any means free from difficulty.

Mr. LACEY. Will my friend yield right there? I do not want to interrupt, but I want to ask for information.

Mr. BROSIUS. I know; everyone is asking for information;

but I have no time.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman has made a misstatement. I do not think he desires to do so.

Mr. BROSIUS. I only have a few minutes.
Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman—
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] has refused over and over again to yield.
Mr. NORTHWAY. I do not want to interrupt, but I want to make a reques The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr.

BROSIUS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I want to request that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] be extended until he concludes his remarks, because he is chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and we want to ask him questions o'clock.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the time will not be extended beyond 4

Mr. BROSIUS.

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, no. The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] be extended indefinitely. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman now yield for a question?

Mr. BROSIUS. With the greatest satisfaction.

Mr. LACEY. I understand the gentleman to say that there is Mr. LACEY. I understand the gentleman to say that there is no possibility by which politics can enter into the selection of employees in the civil service. Now, is it not true that the eligible list has to be drawn from—three persons in number—and that the political character of these men is very easily ascertained? And does it not often happen that the party in power selects, and generally selects, a man who is of the same politics from the eligible list? That is one point I want to ask you about; and also to ask you if there is any remedy for it.

Mr. BROSIUS. My friend is entitled to the benefit of that statement. It is true, just as he has said, that when a vacancy is announced in any Department the Civil Service Commission certify three persons from the head of the list. It had not occurred to me that the discretion that the appointing officer has in select-to me that the discretion that the appointing officer has in selecting one of those three involved a political discrimination that was worth mentioning. Now, I concede there is a possibility of there being among the three persons at least one of each political party, and if the appointing officer chooses to find out and select the one of his own party he has the power to do it. His discretion goes to that length.

The danger, however, which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr.

LACEY] apprehends is more apparent than real, for in practice, as he can see by looking at the number of certifications and the number appointed in a large number of cases two are chosen from the three certified, which is permissible where there are two vacancies. I am assured by the Civil Service Commissioners that vacancies. I am assured by the Civil Service Commissioners that little attention is given by appointing officers to the politics of eligibles certified for appointment.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, what I wish to ask my friend is this: As chairman of that committee, whether he had any method by which that could be prevented. As a matter of fact, I understand that under the party in power whether it he Demogration. stand that under the party in power, whether it be Democratic or Republican, as the case may be, there is no difficulty in having persons of its political faith appointed; and, after all, politics are not taken out of the civil service. Is there any remedy?

Mr. HENDERSON. Better not change it for the next four years. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROSIUS. It is not possible for us to devise a civil-service system free from fault. We have not arrived at perfection.
Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, yes; I yield to everybody. I am here for the day.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. In the official document to which I referred it is shown that there were 1,638 appointments in the Interior and Treasury Departments. Does the gentleman know, or rather believe, that even 38 of these 1,638 were Republicans?

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not know; and I will give a handsome reward to any man who will put me on a plan by which I can ascertain the ratio of the two parties in the executive civil service of this country.

Mr. HENDERSON. It fluctuates.

Mr. BROSIUS. I have been unable to find out, and I have interrogated those who I thought ought to know; but I can get no information about it. And I believe that one-half of the statements made upon that subject are as vague, as uncertain, and unreliable as the information we get from Cuba. We know nothing about it.

Mr. CANNON. Now, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question at that point?

Mr. BROSIUS. With great pleasure. I am here for the day.

Mr. CANNON. I want to say, as a preface to the question, I do not think we are going to repeal the civil-service law; but I think there is perhaps a real evil presented by the amendment proposed to be offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire that I want to call my friend's attention to, namely, that when the present Administration came in—and I have no doubt it was so under the former Administration—a large number of employees a heads of divisions that were not in the civil service were dropped, mustered out of the service, and their places filled purely from a political standpoint, and in some instances, I will not say in all, by incompetent people, by competent people in some instances, I will not say in all. Now, then, there came in an order covering that class of employees by the civil service. As I understand, the gentleman from New Hampshire claims that as to such appointments people who were in the civil service who are competent should be eligible to reappointment.

Mr. BROSIUS. I get the gentleman's point without further

Mr. CANNON. Now, what I want to understand is whether the gentleman would favor a continuance of the spoils system so far as its preservation there is concerned, or whether he is in harmony with some arrangement like unto that which is offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire?

Mr. BROSIUS. I am not willing, speaking personally, to preserve any portion of the spoils system for any purpose whatever serve any portion of the spoils system for any purpose whatever, for I regard it as intrinsically bad, as iniquitous, as absolutely below the degree of tolerance; and I would not preserve it, so far as I am concerned, in any part of the civil service of this country when a better system could be applied.

I do not see how any man can be of a different opinion after witnessing the object lesson in this House yesterday, which will be read, I have no doubt, with regret if not humiliation by many good people of this country. Two legislative days were consumed by a controversy whether the Capulets or the Montagues should enjoy the patronage of the new Library, that great institution, with that great erection, which is not surpassed if equaled as a combination of architecture and art in any other country. Do you not know what the discriminating people of this country will say when they read those proceedings? They will say, "A plague on both your houses. Those places shall not be the prey of politics, but shall be filled by a mode of selection which recognizes on both your houses. Those places shall not be the prey of politics, but shall be filled by a mode of selection which recognizes merit and qualification alone as the paramount test of fitness

But the difficulty to which my friend refers is one which is not easily overcome, unless we establish a tribunal of appeal from the decisions and the decrees of the chiefs to appoint and remove. It has always been a difficulty. I was about to refer to that a moment ago in relation to the discipline of the civil service after the employees are admitted through civil-service rules. When Mr. Harrison came in, in 1889, it became a question of how promotions and reductions and removals were to take place. The Civil Service Commission, desirous to make the civil service as effective as possible, had a conference with the President upon that subject, I have been advised. It was the opinion of President Harrison that have been advised. It was the opinion of President Harrison that the question of promotions, reductions, and removals ought to be left to be treated by the Departments themselves. President Harrison thought that an "efficiency record" was a suitable and proper means of ascertaining who should be promoted, reduced, or removed. Further, as you will remember, Mr. Harrison's Administration established what they called an "efficiency record," for the government of the employees in these respects. How well it worked men may differ in opinion, but it was practiced throughout that Administration. After that Administration was succeeded by the present one—

Mr. McMILLIN. Right there, before the gentleman goes from this branch of the subject, will he yield to a question?

Mr. BROSIUS. With great satisfaction.

Mr. McMILLIN. Concerning the administration of the civil service by President Harrison's Administration, is it not a fact

Mr. McMILLIN. Concerning the administration of the civil service by President Harrison's Administration, is it not a fact that immediately upon his assuming the duties of the office, or very soon thereafter, he suspended the rule or order which had been made by President Cleveland placing the Railway Mail Service under the civil service, and turned out in less than a year of his Administration between 1,000 and 2,000 Democratic employees and put in his partisan employees?

Mr. BROSIUS. It is perfectly true that President Harrison suspended the operation of an order that had been promulgated by his predecessor, and he did it to the great good of the service, as was afterwards fully and most convincingly demonstrated. That order, it will be remembered, was made at the close of Cleveland's Administration, but its initial operation was projected into President Harrison's term, which was an unsuitable and unseemly thing. When Mr. Harrison came into office, he found unseemly thing. When Mr. Harrison came into office, he found the Railway Mail Service of this country in a state of chaos, and in order to have suitable service it was found necessary to suspend the order that had been promulgated by his predecessor and to reinstate efficient men who had been turned out, and give the Civil Service Commission time to make adequate preparation for the examinations to meet the requirements of the service. I have been advised that the order of suspension was issued on the representation of the only Commissioner then in office that they could not have eligible lists prepared in time for the order to go into operation on the date named therein.

But it is unfortunate for my friends on the other side to suggest a comparison between President Cleveland's first Administration and that of his successor in respect to removals from the Railway Mail Service. That there may be no misapprehension as to the course of events in that Service from 1885 to 1889, I will give the figures from the Report of the Postmaster-General for 1889, as Changes made in the Railway Mail Service during the four years from March 5, 1885, to March L. 1889.

Year.	Remov- als.	Resig- nations.	Proba- tioners dropped.	Deaths.	Totals by years.
Mar. 5, 1885, to Mar. 4, 1886 Mar. 5, 1886, to Mar. 4, 1887 Mar. 5, 1887, to Mar. 4, 1888 Mar. 5, 1888, to Mar. 4, 1889	508 446 503 571	509 453 329 646	394 91 119 103	29 25 41 32	1,440 1,015 992 1,352
Total	each yea		707	127	4,799 4,356 5,334 4,845 4,799

This table, in one respect at least, makes a phenomenal show-ing. It shows that the total changes made in Cleveland's first Administration were exactly equal to the total number in the Service on March 5, 1885.

Mr. McMILLIN. But does not the gentleman know that men were put in under the Harrison Administration who had not been connected with the service before, and who had never passed any civil-service examination?

Mr. BROSIUS. There was no civil-service examination for that service at that time, and after the order of President Cleveland was suspended the employees were, of course, appointed in the old way

Mr. McMILLIN. And appointed from the Republican party, as the gentleman will candidly admit.

Mr. BROSIUS. I am not able to say how many Republicans or how many Democrats were appointed. I only know that the effi-ciency of the Railway Mail Service, as indicated by the ratio of pieces handled to errors committed, showed very rapid improvement after President Harrison suspended that order.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that of five men restored in my district three were Democrats, and they were restored upon my recommendation, and it was so all over the country.

Mr. McMILLIN. It was not so all over the country. The gentleman is wholly in error about that.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Perhaps it was not so in the same proportion.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield for a colloquy between members of the committee, because that would take not only all of this day, but to-morrow as well, when we shall not be ere. [Laughter.] Mr. HENDERSON.

here. [Laughter.]
Mr. HENDERSON. I will ask the gentleman whether it is not true that the order that was suspended by President Harrison had been made just before Mr. Cleveland retired from office?
Mr. BROSIUS. Immediately before his retirement.
Mr. HENDERSON. I remember distinctly that the Harrison Administration looked up the record of the men that had been removed, grading them "one," "two," and "three," and those as low as three were not eligible to reappointment, and were not reappointed even upon the recommendation of a member of Congress. I tried myself to get a man in and failed, but by virtue of reappointed even upon the recommendation of a member of congress. I tried myself to get a man in and failed, but by virtue of President Harrison's suspension of that order, I did get in several old soldiers, splendid officers, faithful men.

Mr. COX. Who decided that question of efficiency?

Mr. HENDERSON. The Department; on the record the men had made during their term of service. There never was a more righteous exercise of power than that which took place in pursuits of their exercises and there never was a more brital abuse.

ance of that suspension, and there never was a more brutal abuse of power than there was in the removals of men who were faith-ful to the service and faithful to the country, even with their

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, I have observed on other occasions that the questions of my friend from Tennessee always suggest thought in others [laughter], and now, while I feel under obligation to answer any questions that may be addressed to me because I have had my time so liberally extended, I can not yield for colloquies or debates between members of the committee.

[Laughter.]

I was speaking of the improvement in the efficiency of the Railway Mail Service. At the time that order of Mr. Cleveland was issued the state of the service was portrayed by a ratio of about 4,000 pieces of mail matter handled to 1 error committed in the handling. After the order had been suspended and the offices filled by more efficient men, the ratio began to rise, until to-day, or at least within a month, there are, as I am informed, 10,000 pieces of matter handled to 1 error committed. Of course I speak in round numbers Now, Mr. Chairman, in reference to the amendment of my friend from New Hampshire [Mr. Baker], I want to say that, apart from any question of its merits, the amendment is obnoxious to a point of order which has been or will be made, and I want to point out briefly in what respect it is obnoxious to the point of order. I think it very unwise on an appropriation bill to alter or modify in any material respect our civil-service law. The law and the rules promulgated under it provide, and have for many years provided, for a mode of reinstating persons who have been separated from the service for any cause not involving their own fault or delinquency.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Is there not a time limit on that?

Mr. BROSIUS. I was about to state that, but I can not state the whole law in one breath. It would have been stated before now if the gentleman had not interrupted. [Laughter.] The law and the rules, I say, provide how persons who have been separated from the service for any cause not involving their own fault or delinquency may be reinstated, but it wisely imposes a limit of definduency may be reinstated, but it wisely imposes a finite or time upon that reinstatement, namely, one year. That is, if a person has become separated from the service, from no cause involving his own fault or delinquency, he can be reinstated at any time within a year. That is a very wise provision, because without such a limit the law would enable the appointing power, if he chose, to reinstate a man in office for any length of time, long after he had ceased to possess the qualifications which in the first instance made him eligible to appointment.

It is easily seen that to open that "spoils gate" would lead to the overthrow to a large extent of the merit system and result in great detriment and injury to the public service. To guard against that evil. the limit was placed at one year, in analogy to against that evil, the limit was placed at one year, in analogy to the rule requiring an examination every year to keep up an applicant's eligibility. Now, the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire proposes to repeal that part of the law by abolishing the limitation entirely, which would open the service to the reinstatement of anybody who had ever been in the service after any length of time. If a man had been dismissed ten years ago, and is now ten years older and correspondingly less efficient, he could still be reinstated by the appointing officer.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman consent to an amendment which will make that limit five years instead of

Mr. BROSIUS. No; I will not consent to any amendment that materially alters or modifies the civil-service law, because I think it is not a suitable thing to do upon an appropriation bill. When a change is made, if it is to be made, it ought to be done with deliberation and by a bill for that special object. But it is obnox-ious to a point of order not only in that respect, but it changes existing law in another respect. Under the present law no one can be reinstated at any time, except to a position requiring no higher qualification than the one from which he was separated. But that limitation is also repealed by this amendment, so that a man can not only be reinstated at any time without limit, but to any place without limit. And certainly members of this committee will see the utter impropriety of such an alteration of our civilservice law. It would emasculate the law; it would destroy it to a great extent; practically it would not be worth a twopence after you opened the gates to such unlimited reinstatements.

Mr. Chairman, the civil service of this country is full of difficulty. I was speaking a moment ago about the difficulties that President Harrison found in the administration of the service.

For twenty years, or well-nigh that period, the offices were filled for twenty years, or well-nigh that period, the offices were filled by one party, because the Republican party was in the ascendency and controlled the patronage of the Government. Then there were not so many removals, because Republicans were not eager to dismiss some Republicans in order to appoint other Republicans. For example, for twenty years the chiefs of division were pro-moted from within and showed the normal operation of the serv-ice when unaffected by the vicious influence of politics. When the civil-service law went into operation the chiefs of division were put on an excepted list and remained there until the recent order was promplested, and were to a great extent the featballs of put on an excepted list and remained there until the recent order was promulgated, and were to a great extent the footballs of party politics. I am told it takes four years for an average man to become a competent chief of division. They must learn from the bottom toward the top and can learn in no other way. While they were regarded as spoils, apprentices were kept in place. When Mr. Cleveland came into office the first time, in 1885, he found these places on an excepted list and treated as political appointments. He continued to treat them as such and turned the incumbents out and filled the places with Democrats to a greater or less extent. In that Administration the Civil Service Commissioners tried to have the chiefs of division classified, as I believe they also did under the Harrison Administration, but believe they also did under the Harrison Administration, but their suggestion was not honored with Executive approval

After that was done-after these offices were all filled with Democrats—whether to the advantage or the detriment of the service the Lord only knows, excepting as we may judge from the report of the chiefs and heads of Departments—after it was all done and after all the other places in the executive service were filled up with Democrats as far as they could be (and I condemn that as much as anyone), then the President of the United States promulgated his new order extending the civil service to nearly every place in the executive civil service of the United States. Now, however he may have sinned in the early part of his Administration, manifestly he saw his error; he repented and became converted, and issued a thoroughgoing civil-service merit-system verted, and issued a thoroughgoing civil-service merit-system order.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Is it not rather the fact that the President, after he had secured all these offices, attempted by that order to keep them?

Mr. BROSIUS. That is exactly what I said. He could only appoint them for the purpose of keeping them. I supposed even my friend from New Hampshire would know that he did not appoint them to dismiss them.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And for that reason he is not entitled to the usufruct of his own sin.

Mr. BROSIUS. Well. I always thought that what a man does

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, I always thought that what a man does in his unregenerate days ought not to be thrown up to him after he has repented and becomes sanctified and occupies a front pew in the church.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Even though he holds stolen

Mr. BROSIUS. No, sir. That remark is intended for an illustration, but it is one that does not illustrate.

Now I want to direct the attention of the committee to the state Now I want to direct the attention of the committee to the state of the rules at this time in relation to the making of political discriminations in the service. And I think it is eminently right; it is sound through and through, and it does not detract from its soundness with me because it is promulgated by a Democratic President. The truth in the matter does not depend upon the politics of the lips that declare it; not with me. Now I will read from Rule II, section 1:

Any person in the executive civil service of the United States who shall willfully violate any of the provisions of the civil-service act or of these rules shall be dismissed from office.

Now, one trouble I have found with the civil-service law hitherto has been that there was no penalty attached to the violation of the provisions of the law with respect to political discrimination. But under this rule the man who offends is to be dismissed from office. And it is only necessary to enforce the law to prevent such discriminations.

The second section reads-

No person in the executive civil service shall use his official authority or official influence for the purpose of interfering with an election or controlling the result thereof.

A MEMBER. What rule is that? Mr. BROSIUS. The third section of rule 2. Now mark the language of the third section:

No person in the executive civil service shall dismiss or cause to be dismissed or make any attempt to procure the dismissal of, or in any manner change the official rank or compensation of any other person therein because of his political or religious opinions or affiliations.

Mr. Chairman, that came from a Democratic Executive; but in my judgment it is 24-karat fine, and I would write it in letters of gold over the archway to the entrance of every Department of the Government. If that section were faithfully carried out, we the Government. If that section were faithfully carried out, we would have an executive civil service as near perfection as we can hope to arrive at. It would come up even to the exacting requirements of my friend from the old Granite Sta e, Mr. Baker.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wish to ask the gent e nan whether that rule has been carried out by the present Administration?

Mr. BROSIUS. My friend asks whether that rule has been carried out by the present Administration. It has not. The rule did not exist until the promulgation of the order of May 6, 1896.

To what extent it has been observed since that I am unable to say.

To what extent it has been observed since that I am unable to say.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman allow me

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman and will a question?
Mr. BROSIUS. With pleasure.
Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. When has there been any "spoils system" within the last ten years, excepting—
Mr. BROSIUS. Why, sir, a man who has been a member of this House for all these years and has had as much to say about the civil service of the country as my distinguished friend from New Hampshire.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman give a direct answer?

Mr. BROSIUS. For him to ask me whether there has been a time within ten years when the civil service of the United States has not been under the merit system! Why, bless his innocent soul, we started under the act of 1883 with only 14.500 in the classified service out of a total of 131,000 employees in the entire civil service. Then there were successive extensions until the beginning of this year, when the number in the classified service reached 55,786. Then the recent order of extension added to that number 27,563, still leaving 91,297 employees untouched by the competitive system.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Does not the gentleman know that of these dismissals a very large number were under the civil-service rules and had been ever since 1883?

Mr. BROSIUS. If my friend from New Hampshire believes that statement, it is because he has said it so often that he has begun to consider it as true.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Because it is true.
Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me a moment?

allow me a moment?

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. As I understand the gentleman, he claims that up to within six months past removals have been made for political causes and appointments have been made for the same reason, and that now these appointments are covered by the civil-service rules. That is true, is it not?

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, not just as you have stated it, because the gentleman makes no discrimination between the classified and the unclassified service.

the unclassified service.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But if there was any evil growing out of it, the civil-service rules and their operation, to that extent, the gentleman will admit, would protect them?

Mr. BROSIUS. The civil-service law and rules protect, to a great extent, those who are within its provisions, and none others.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If the gentleman will allow me, let me complete my statement.

I am told—I have no knowledge of the fact myself, beyond the information that has been conveyed to me—that our pension examining boards throughout the country are under the civil-service rules.

Mr. HILL. They will be after the 10th of January.
Mr. NORTHWAY (continuing). Or rather, that they will be, as the gentleman says, after the 10th of January. Now, so far as as the gentleman says, after the luth of January. Now, so far as I know, these appointments, up to the present time, have been filled by Democrats.

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.

Mr. NORTHWAY. And your civil-service rules will protect them in the enjoyment of their offices forever. Politics fills them, and politics will protect them.

Mr. BROSIUS. Politics have filled them and politics should vacate them. Is that the point?

Mr. NORTHWAY. I would not have, for the examination of our soldiers, these men all of one political party. It does not seem reasonable or just.

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, if I were a czar, if I had the power to regulate the civil service of the United States, I think I could be nonpartisan enough—I say I think I could, I do not know that I could be, because I am a thoroughgoing Republican, and do not know just how far I would yield to the solicitation of politics—but if I had the control of it I think I could formulate nonpartisan rules that would cover the point to which the gentleman has referred. But as I have not control, I think I can say now from the standpoint of patriotic independence that I would extend the civil-service rules of the country to cover every employee of the service of the Government of the United States, and make merit and efficiency the paramount test for appointment and promotion; and I would do it when the parties were evenly divided in the service of the country as nearly as is practicable. And if the President of the United States had looked to it to have the offices fairly divided in the places covered by his order before issuing it there could have been, and would have been, no complaint made about it. But Republicans very naturally flinch when they see the places filled with adherents of the present Administration and of its political ideas, and find these places now covered and protected by the ægis of an Executive order promulgated in the last year of the Administration. I am not surprised that the Republicans squeal. I feel like squealing myself, and I would if there was any remedy for it without turning our backs upon our own principles. man has referred. But as I have not control, I think I can say now own principle

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire (interrupting). What is the merit system?

Mr. BROSIUS. What is the "merit system?" The merit system is one that recognizes personal worth, intelligence, qualification, and fitness as the paramount condition of eligibility for the public service.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts.
Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire.
I agree absolutely with the gentleman from Pennsylvania.
Mr. BROSIUS. Then the gentleman is correct on that branch of the subject

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But as the civil-service examinations are now conducted, is eligibility any proof of merit? Mr. BROSIUS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I entirely disagree with the gentleman there.

Mr. BROSIUS. When you disagree, it shows that you are wrong. When you agree it proves that you are right. [Laughter.]
Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me

Mr. McCREARY of Rentacy,
a question?
Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.
Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The gentleman is chairman of the Civil Service Committee, I believe?
Mr. BROSIUS. I am that unfortunate individual. [Laughter.]
Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: After an order has been issued by the President whereing within the service rules certain classes of employees, has the successor of that President power, by order, to suspend the operation of that rule?

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, my friend from Kentucky is very astute; but I think I am a little too astute to fall into a trap that he would set for me like that. My friend will excuse me if I say that the irrelevancy of the inquiry is so obvious that it does not require an answer.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I*hope my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] will not misappreciate the question. I have never had time to study the civil-service law closely, and I suppose that he, as chairman of the committee, has studied it closely, and I am anxious to have information on this subject.

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, I think that is quite likely.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Has the gentleman any opinion on that subject at all?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Has the gentleman any opinion on that subject at all?

Mr. BROSIUS. I know persons who are in urgent need of information on the subject of the civil service; but when a law officer of the Government is interrogated about the law in a certain case, he politely replies that he will cross that river when he gets to it, and I shall have to make that reply, because I do not care to go into that subject. I have no doubt Mr. McKinley will do what he thinks is right in the premises.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The civil service has been considerably extended within the last few months.

Mr. BROSIUS. Obviously so.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] indorse the extension of it?

Mr. BROSIUS. Is that the whole of the question?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. That is the only question I propose to ask just now.

propose to ask just now.

Mr. BROSIUS. I indorse the extension of the order, but I condemn in unmeasured terms the wholesale removal of Republicans to make places for Democrats previous to issuing the order, if that was done to the extent believed by some; as for myself, I am not prepared to believe the President went as far in this direction as is currently reported.

But if he did, time will cure the wrong and make things even. Under the merit system there is no danger that Republicans will not have their share of the offices. They have all to gain and nothing to lose. An incident is told me by Major Harlow, one of the Civil Service Commissioners, of a Democratic collector in Vermont, which illustrates the practical working of competitive examinations in this respect.

One day some of the party leaders came to the Vermont collector and complained:

"See here, Mr. Smalley, you have not got any Democrats in your office. These fellows holding the Government positions are all Republicans."

Well, what do you suggest?" asked the collector.

"Well, what do you suggest?" asked the collector.

"We've got a couple of good Democrats, and we want you to put out two Republicans and give them the places," was the reply.

"All right," said Mr. Smalley; "I am a little hampered, but I'll see what can be done. You see this list of names?"

"Well, run over it and see if you can find the names of your two Democrats on it.

The politicians did as directed. One of them suddenly blurted

"What is this darned thing, anyway, Mr. Smalley?"
"That." answered the collector, "is the list of persons who have passed the civil-service examination. If any vacancies occur in my office force, the law requires me to fill them from the names on that list."

"But these are all Republicans, Mr. Smalley; there is not a Democrat on the list."

"I am afraid not," said the collector regretfully.

"The trouble is, our Vermont Democrats don't go to school, as they should, and until they do, there is no way of getting them Government positions."

Another illustrative incident is worth recording in this connection. Major Harlow had an experience while postmaster at St. Louis which matches Mr. Smalley's story very well. Father Walsh, the shrewd rector of St. Bridget's parish, made a study of the civil-service law, and one day came to the post-office and got a copy of the regulations governing examinations. The next time a copy of the regulations governing examinations. The next time there was an examination at the post-office a group of bright young fellows from St. Bridget's parish school put in an appearance as candidates. They had evidently been prepared with care. Some of them came out of the examination with the highest percentages and were given positions. "That thing continued," said Major Harlow. "Father Walsh's young men would come out of the examinations at the top of the list, and under the law they would get the appointments as vacancies occurred. One day some of my A. P. A. friends came into the office and said: 'Look here, Harlow, you are filling up the post-office with Catholics. Why don't you give Protestants a chance?'"

These incidents show that the competitive system possesses the merit enjoyed by a certain church, which, a wag suggested, he preferred to any other, because it had nothing to do with either politics or religion.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Is it not true that during Harrison's Administration there were a great many changes made that resulted in placing more Republicans in office than Demo-

Mr. BROSIUS. I presume likely.
Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Do you indorse that?
Mr. BROSIUS. Well, that is past.
Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. There are about 76,000 officers of the United States who are not embraced in the civil service.

of the United States who are not embraced in the civil service. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosus] desire that the civil service shall be extended so as to embrace them?.

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, that is not before us, but I do not hesitate to answer my friend. Of course not. In the administration of the civil service of the country, as in the administration of all other practical affairs, we ought to try to be as practical as we can, to secure the highest degree of benefit and usefulness within the limit of what is practical and useful. Now, it is the wildest folly in the world to pursue a theory beyond that point.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a

Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a Mr. ANDERSON.

a question?

Mr. BROSIUS. Wait till I get through with what I am saying. Therefore I would not, because of obvious and practical ing. Therefore I would not, because of obvious and practical difficulties that would be encountered, be in favor of covering the entire service with the merit system. I do not care to go into a discussion of what officers I would put into the classified service and what officers I would not.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I did not ask that.

Mr. ANDERSON. Now will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is there anything in the merit system that prevents the head of a Department from inquiring and finding out, when he has two men reported from the head of the eligible list, which of those men is a Republican and which is a Democrat, and taking his choice in appointing or promoting him?

Mr. BROSIUS. The only rule upon that subject is section 4 of

Rule II, which says:

4. No question in any examination or form of application shall be so framed as to elicit information concerning, nor shall any inquiry be made concerning, nor any other attempt be made to ascertain, the political or religious opinions or affiliations of any applicant, competitor, or eligible; and all disclosures thereof shall be discountenanced. And no discrimination shall be exercised, threatened, or promised against or in favor of any applicant, competitor, or eligible because of his political or religious opinions or affiliations.

And anyone violating that rule is liable to be dismissed from office.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is not that done, as a matter of fact, in almost every case?

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, perhaps so. I have no doubt it is done.
I have no doubt that the best law that human wisdom ever devised is frequently violated, and when I see some of the best Republicans I know on this floor advocating what I regard as a despicable system of spoils I am not surprised that other men, who are not their equals in merit or in any other way, commit infractions of law. I have no doubt they do.

Mr. ANDERSON. Down here in the General Land Office there are quite a number of special agents whose duty it is to investigate land entries and other entries. Now, does the gentleman insist that this examination in arithmetic, algebra, and geometry—such an examination as is formulated in the Civil Service Commission-shows the competency of these men for that special service?

Mr. BROSIUS. Now, I know my friend is intelligent, and that he will comprehend me when I say that when he mentions a detail in the administration of this office which may not be observed carefully or with the greatest fidelity, that that is not to be held an argument against the system. I have no doubt that in these examinations some persons are asked improper questions; but on the whole, and in the large aggregate, the questions that are pro-pounded in these examinations, so far as I know, are appropriate and suitable to the purpose of eliciting the information and knowledge which will best qualify the person for the office he is seeking.

There is no warrant for the complaint sometimes heard that the examinations are not of a character to test fitness for office: that they are scholastic, technical, bookish, and not practical. In conversation with the Commissioners I have obtained information which throws some light upon this subject.

The Commission has given more than 250 different kinds of examinations, and is liable at any time to be called upon to prepare any of these examinations to meet the demands of the service. The examining work of the Commission covers a wider range than the curriculum of any educational institution in the country. In fact, in the preparation of examination papers the Commission combines the functions of the common school, high school, business college, and the university, as well as the technological institute. The examinations range from the simplest educational test for skilled laborers, messengers, and watchmen, to the highly technical tests for Patent Office, the Department of Agriculture, the Geological Survey, Supervising Architect's Office, etc. In the preparation of examinations the Commission carefully avoids the introduction of any tests which are not of value in bringing out the qualifications of applicants for the positions which they seek. So-called "catch" questions are unknown in civil-service examinations. Only common-sense business questions are given to test the fitness of applicants for the civil service.

The regular clerk examination for Department service is confined to spelling, copying, letter writing, and arithmetic as far as percentage. It has been suggested to the Commission that other subjects ought to be introduced into this examination to test the general intelligence of competitors, but the Commission does not believe in testing applicants upon subjects which are not pertinent to the duties of the positions which they seek, and which are of no value in determining their relative fitness for the public service. For this reason it is the constant aim of the Commission to see that its examinations are in line with the requirements of the positions to be filled. In the examinations for minor positions, such as skilled laborers, printers' assistants, messengers, etc., the educational tests are necessarily of the simplest character. As to the clerks and carriers at post-offices, they are examined in simple spelling, copying, letter writing and the fundamental rules of arithmetic. They are also required to show some knowledge of United States geography, especially in regard to the location of cities and States, and in addition they must show their ability to read ordinary addresses correctly, all of which tests are directly applicable to the duties of the service which they desire to enter.

Of the examinations for special and technical positions, the educational tests are more severe, owing to the character of the positions sought. If a draftsman or chemist is required, the competitors are examined in drafting or chemistry, or if the positions to be filled require a knowledge of other special or technical subjects, the competitors are examined upon those subjects. It will thus be seen that the examinations of the Commission vary with the requirements of the service, the simple examinations being given to those who seek positions where the duties require little educational qualification, and the more difficult examinations being given to those who seek positions requiring higher qualifications

Mr. ANDERSON. Now, I ask you further if it would not be a fact that the Commissioner of the General Land Office could talk to these gentlemen in his office and in a few minutes find out their qualifications much better than through one of these examinations—I will not say one of these absurd examinations—one of these civil-service examinations? In other words, he knows the kind of work in which they are to be engaged-

Mr. BROSIUS. Why, how could a man take into his office all the people who have a right to compete for the honor of serving their country in her civil service and talk over their qualifications for office? And if he could, how would he escape the solicitations and importunities of members of Congress in the interest of their patriotic and self-segrificing constituents?

maintainties of members of conscisuants in the interest of their patriotic and self-sacrificing constituents?

Mr. ANDERSON. They were examined for that special service?

Mr. BROSIUS. It does not make any difference.

Mr. ANDERSON. A business man ought to have the right to select men to conduct the business of which he is the head.

Mr. BROSIUS. Yes, sir; a private business man has that right; but this business is not done for you or any other business man; it is done for the people of the United States.

Mr. ANDERSON. Precisely.

Mr. ANDERSON. Precisely.
Mr. BROSIUS. And the people have the right to have the best service they can get; and the way to get the best service is to open the gateway of the civil service of the country to the personal worth, merit, and intelligence of the whole land.
Mr. ANDERSON. Precisely. That is the point I was making—that they would get a better service by this mode of procedure.
Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly; manifestly so.
Mr. WILLIS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question if he will yield he will yield.

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, because I will not probably have an opportunity to take part in this debate, and I want to vote intelligently. I would like to hear the gentleman upon a point that I do not know what to do with. The gentleman upon a point that I do not know what to do with. The gentleman has stated here that thirty-three by the last report were below the line of efficiency. I believe that was about the time this merit system was thoroughly introduced. "There were then," he said, "thirty-three below the standard of efficiency in the departmental service." That is, before that report was made, or about that time, the service was thoroughly filled under the weils system, a great fleed of appointments were made, poured spoils system, a great flood of appointments were made—poured in through the spoils funnel, so to speak—and after that occurred, this report goes on to say, there were only thirty-three persons in the departmental service below the line of efficiency. Does the gentleman believe that?

Mr. BROSIUS. I must. It is not my purpose or my duty to impugn the sincerity, the candor, or the honesty of the chiefs of the bureaus and Departments, the men who made this report. I might not agree to their standard, but I would not like to express any doubt of the truthfulness of their reports.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he does not consider that as one of the few phenomena which have occurred in the present age that this occurred under this corrupt and iniquitous spoils system, and yet that it should happen that there were only thirty-three in the service below the line of effi-

Mr. BROSIUS. Well, I once heard an Englishman say about an argument that it was pregnant with three assumptions and five fallacies; and I should say that this argument, if it is intended for Mr. BROSIUS. fallacies; and I should say that this argument, if it is intended for such, is pregnant with one assumption at least, and I do not know how many fallacies. Now, the assumption is that these officers were in the classified service of the country. They were to some extent in the classified service, and to a great extent in the unclassified service. Now, I am not able to say how many of these delinquents were in the classified and how many were in the unclassified service, because the inquiries covered all the offices; and I have not been able to find out how many of these delinand I have not been able to find out how many of these delinquents were in the one service or the other. It is a matter of no earthly consequence, so far as I can understand the point of my friend's inquiry.

Mr. TRACEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

ment reports a vacancy and asks for three eligibles, that he may refuse to make a selection of either of the three and may demand another three. Is that correct?

Mr. BROSIUS. That is correct, provided he finds a physical disability or some insuperable difficulty in the individuals which renders them unsuitable for the service. In that case, he may return the list, with his statement of the reasons for so doing, and if the reasons are approved by the Civil Service Commission they certify another list; otherwise not.

Mr. TRACEY. May I ask one more question?

Mr. BROSIUS. Why, with pleasure.

Mr. TRACEY. Why is it esteemed to be necessary under the merit system to leave the head of a Department or the chief of a bureau the right to choose any of three men, instead of requiring him to take the highest on the list?

Mr. BROSIUS. Why is it necessary for you to have a little piece of elastic in your suspenders instead of having them wholly elastic? It is perfectly obvious to everybody that a little flexibility.

elastic? It is perfectly obvious to everybody that a little flexibility in the practical operation of business affairs is useful. I can not tell why the law was so made, but I see no practical objection to that provision of it.

Mr. TRACEY. Does it not lead to the very complaint you are

Mr. BROSIUS. It does not, because in its average, in the totality of effect, that is so trifling as to be of no consequence. It cuts no figure in the efficiency of the civil service of the country. That is all. If it did, I think it ought to be amended.

Mr. TRACEY. Does it not cut a figure, however, in the make-up of the political character of the service?

Mr. BROSIUS. I do not believe it can, because if you give it its utmost effect, if you include the very furthest limit of effect that can possibly result, it would be too insignificant to be considered in regard to the predominance of one party or the other in the service.

Gentlemen will understand that when a vacancy is made in the civil service—the classified portion of it—the officer knows that civil service—the classified portion of it—the officer knows that he can not select anyone to fill the place, but that the vacancy must be filled by a certification from the eligible list. He does not know whether a Republican or a Democrat is to be certified, and therefore his motive for creating the vacancy is utterly destroyed, and it is the history of the classified service that only about 2 per cent per annum of change is made in that part of the service which is filled through the competitive or merit system. The conditions of good administration require, according to the experience of those best informed, about 2 per cent, or a trifle more, of changes in a year.

Mr. TRACEY. I do not want to be troublesome, but I do want to get some information, and I want to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. BROSIUS. I shall be happy if I can supply the gentleman with information. Let me say in this connection that the experience of the past has shown that removals of those who entered the service through the competitive system are very little more than 2 per cent each year, as I have stated, while of those in the classified service who entered under the old system something over 6 per cent are removed; but of those in the unclassified service the removals have ranged from 40 to 80 per cent each year. This is very persuasive evidence in favor of the merit system.

But there is another development in the civil service which

But there is another development in the civil service which illustrates the vicious tendency of the spoils system. I am advised by those who have given careful attention to the subject that since 1883 there has been a progressive increase in the number of unclassified places in the civil service and a progressive decrease in the property of places and the civil service and a progressive decrease. unclassified places in the civil service and a progressive decrease in the number of places filled by competitive examination. The president of the Civil Service Commission advises me that the classified clerical places in Washington within the same limits of service have decreased 3.9 per cent since 1883, effecting a saving of $228,200, while the unclassified places increased in number in the same period 37 per cent, involving an extra yearly expenditure of $2,971,875, and that if the patronage system had remained unchecked and the positions which have been made competitive had increased in the same proportion it would require an extra yearly expenditure of $3,100,620 for salaries in Washington alone.

This affords most convincing evidence of the economy of the competitive system, and I entertain no doubt that the "merit system," which the Civil Service Commission are honestly and industriously, within the limits of the appropriation allowed them, trying to make as effective as possible, is more than paying its way in money saved to the Government in the conduct of its civil service. One other matter I want to mention. A very erroneous idea

One other matter I want to mention. A very erroneous idea prevails in some quarters that the merit system contemplates a life tenure in office. The only tenure known to the merit system is the "efficiency" tenure. The only life tenure ever known in our civil service was under the spoils system, where political influence could keep a man in office long after he ceased to be efficient. From the standard point of the morit system there is no second. Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly.

Mr. TRACEY. I understand that when the head of a Depart that he is efficient in the performance of his duties. This is the that he is efficient in the performance of his duties. This is the spirit of civil-service reform, and it would be given full effect in practice if reform methods prevailed within the service in the matter of promotions, reductions, and dismissals, as they do in admissions to the service. Equally groundless is the complaint that under the operation of the merit system only young men and young women fresh from school secure places, while practical knowledge is ignored. Perhaps no better illustration of the practical working of the merit system in this respect can be afforded than a statement of the occupations of persons appointed to the classified departmental service from June 30, 1895, to June 30, 1896. The records of the Commission show the occupations of The records of the Commission show the occupations of 207 appointees in the period named, as follows:

Now, in conclusion, to show how thoroughly the country is in unity with reform in the civil service, and how the two great political parties have vied with each other in declarations of devotion to the merit system, I insert some utterances of distinguished statesmen and others, together with the planks in the party plat-forms on this subject since 1872, and also the declarations of the Republican President-elect on the subject, that those who sporadically assail the existing system by trying to strike out the necessary appropriation to carry it out may see how unequal they are to the task.

REPRESENTATIVE MEN ON CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

The objection which is expressed in the cry of "life tenure" and "a privileged class" is one of the most ancient and familiar appeals of the spoils system to ignorance and prejudice. * * * Of all the familiar tricks of the American demagogue none is more amusingly contemptible than the effort to show that a system which tends to promote a degrading loss of self-respect and a cringing dependence upon personal favor is peculiarly a manly and American system. Civil-service reform is but another successive step in the development of liberty under law.—George William Curtis.

In some regards it [the tyranny of the spoils system] was more dangerous, because less obvious, more insidious and obscure, and less easily arousing the indignant revolt of the moral sense of the people, than the one that fell with the triumph of the Union armies.—Edward Cary.

It [party spirit] exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.—Washington.

Talent and worth alone are to be inquired into.—Jefferson in reply to Gallatin.

Talent and worth alone are to be inquired into.—Jefferson in reply to Gallatin.

Every man of sense knows that he can go to any of these Departments and cut off one-half of the elerical force, and yet have a sufficient force to perform all the duties. If others do not know it, I. at least, have a very strong conviction on this point. There is scarcely a Department of this Government in which, if conducted by a private corporation, he would not only reduce the compensation of these employees, but reduce largely the number of the employees. Who does not know that this is so in every one of the Executive Departments?—Senator Sherman, Congressional Globe, 1870, page 3346.

The greatest reform we could bring about would be to free Senators and Representatives of all responsibility as to the distribution of offices.—Representative John J. Kleiner, 1886.

Offices are public trusts, not private spoils.—Daniel Webster.

No people have a higher public interest, except the preservation of their liberties, than integrity in the administration of their Government in all its branches. United States Supreme Court.

The oft-repeated maxim that the public service should be conducted on business principles means that accuracy, promptitude, honesty, and efficiency are as essential in public as in private affairs; but the methods of securing these qualities can not be exactly the same. The merchant has a direct personal and pecuniary interest in his private affairs which leads him to make a careful selection of his employees; but in the public service there must be substituted some more complicated agency in the form of laws, regulations, reports, and inspections.—Col. Silas W. Burt.

The very men who advocate the spoils system for public business would call a man a fool if he proposed the same system for private business.—
Thomas H. Benton.

The right of suffrage, the rule of apportioning representation, and the mode of appointing to and removing from office are fundamental in a free government, and ought to be fixed by the Constitution. An unforeseen multiplication of offices may add a weight to the executive scale, disturbing the equilibrium of the Government. Ishould therefore see with pleasure a guard against the evil, * * * even by an amendment of the Constitution.—

To encourage industry and foster merit by teaching all public servants to look forward to promotion according to their deserts and to expect the highest prizes in the service if they can qualify themselves for them.—Report of British Parliamentary Committee of Investigation, 1860.

With such successes and such moral forces behind us we may indeed hope to see the day when our party warfare will be contests of opinion, free from the demoralizing and repulsive interference of the plunder chase; when a change of party in the national administration will no longer present the barbarous spectacle of a spoils debauch, torturing the nostrils of our own people and disgracing the Republic in the eyes of civilized mankind; when our Presidents and heads of the Executive Departments will no longer be the almoners of party government, in danger of their lives from the furious onset of the begging throng, but will be respected as officers of state having high duties to fulfill which demand all their strength and ability; when the public offices, national, State, and municipal, will cease to be the feudal flefs distributed by bosses, or the merchandise of spoils jobbers, and again serve the true purpose for which they have been instituted, thus becoming once more an integral element of government for the people; and when our legislators, escaped from the shackles of the spoils bondage, no longer beset by the snares and pitfalls which have threatened to wreck their morals and their self-respect, no longer supplicating for Executive favor, will be able and proud to devote all their energies to the great tasks which at a time so full of difficult problems the country imposes upon them.—Carl Schurz.

Original appointment to office no longer depends on character, capability, or presumed or prover fitness, nor does the tenure depend upon fidelity and capacity; but unhesitating serv

It may well alarm the lovers of free institutions when all the offices in these several Departments are spoken of in high places as being 's spoils of victory,' to be enjoyed by those who are successful in contest, in which they profess this grasping of the spoils to have been the object of their efforts.—Daniel Webser.

The continued operation of the law relating to our civil service has added The continued operation of the law relatings to our civil service has added to note that every public officer who has a just idea of his dar fact worthy of note that every public officer who has a just idea of his dar for our damong those who understand it best, and its warmest supporters are those who are restrained and protected by its requirements.—President Cieveland.

The question of civil-service reform is how by law you will take the offices out of politics; how by law you will relieve the men who are chosen to the great duty of governing this country from the petty and degrading work of running about begging for offices in this Department and in that.—Senator Lodge.

Of all characters, my feelings despise a man capable of cringing to power for a benefit or office. Such characters are * * * * badly calculated for a representative system. * * * Merit alone should lead to preferment.—General Jackson in 1800.

There is another important class of officers which * * * friends of reform have endeavored earnestly to persuade the Executive to include in the classified service, namely, the assistant heads of bureaus, chief clerks, and heads of divisions. The late officers of this grade had generally entered at the lowest point and had risen through the service. As a body, they were trained and competent officers, but the great majority of them have been removed or reduced and their places have been filled with untrained successors. The argument that it is necessary to change such officers in order that a new Administration may learn the actual condition of the public business, is at once the frank centlession of the disast

In 1825 it was held by Judge Barbour, in The Commonwealth vs. Callaghan (2 Va. Cas., 460), that two justices of the peace who were charged with the duty of electing certain officers acted corruptly and criminally because they exercised their power on grounds other than that of the "merit and qualifications of the officers." No motive of personal gain was alleged.

The beneficial influences of 'the civil-service law in its practical workings are clearly apparent. Having been at the head of the Department both before and after its adoption, I am able to judge by comparison of the two systems, and have no hesitation in pronouncing the present condition of affairs as preferable in all respects. * * * Under the instrumentalities which are now used to secure selections for cierical places, the Department has some assurance of manly capacity and also moral worth, as the character of the candidates is ascertained before examination.—William Windom, ex-Secretary of the Treasury.

The persons appointed under this system are unquestionably more efficient, as a whole, than those selected under any system of pure patronage.—Benjamin F. Tracy, ex-Secretary of the Navy.

The Department of the Interior, with its 7,500 clerks, could not be run six months without the great body of the employees being under the civil-service rules.—John W. Noble, ex-Secretary of the Interior.

Another year's experience has served only to strengthen the conviction expressed in my last annual report as to the excellent working of the civil-service law in the Post-Office Department, and my desire to see its operation extended to every branch of the postal service to which such extension is practicable.—Wilson S. Bissell, ex-Postmaster-General.

The General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, in his report for 1894, states:

The civil-service laws and regulations as applied to the Railway Mail Service accomplish all the most sanguine expected. * * * In the judgment of this office the present efficiency could not have been obtained under any other

In referring to the great improvement in the Railway Mail Service since the classification of that service, ex-Postmaster-General Wilson S. Bissell said:

This record is unprecedented in the history of the service and renders comment upon the effect of the civil-service law upon it unnecessary.

Worthy clerks had to do the work of incompetent partisan or official favorites. Those in the postal service were nearly all active partisans and henchmen of great politicians and they did not hesitate to neglect their duties to do the bidding of their masters. When Mr. James (postmaster at New York City) came to his place in 1873 there were confusion, rubbish, and demoralization in the office hardly conceivable. From 400 to 600 of long-neglected bags of mail were found scattered or piled in various parts of the office.—Dorman B. Eaton.

The inspectors when absent from duty were generally engaged in electionsering and in procuring the naturalization of foreigners. * A custom-house tax was regularly levied and paid in advance of elections of the control of the naturalization of foreigners. * A custom-house tax was regularly levied and paid in advance of collections of the political partisans, * and finally there were evidences of official delinquency, if not of downright corruption, which have selden. if ever, occurred in any civilized country on the face of the earth.—Report of Congressional Committee on the New York Custom-House in the Jackson Administration.

It is sometimes urged against civil-service reform that the head of each Department and bureau ought to have the selection of his own subordinates; but under the patronage system he has no such selection at all. The men selected are chosen not on account of the knowledge of their fitness possessed by the appointing officer, but because they are recommended by a certain Representative or Senator. The head of the Department or bureau feels little responsibility for their acts. It often happens that he is not at liberty to discharge an inefficient man lest he may offine the Congressman, on the other hand, does not feel the responsibility for the character of his appointment is made. This system "indicates the discharge

In one case thirty-five persons were put on the "lapse fund" of the Treasurer's office for eight days at the end of the fiscal year, to sop up some money which was in danger of being saved and returned to the Treasury.

From my experience of many years in the Treasury Department I will say that I have very rarely known a person to be selected under the system of patronage because he was the fittest person for the place. It is a consideration which is almost entirely disregarded in the selection of clerks. The only question is, What is the pressure behind him? And the chief of the bureau or division who desires to secure the services of competent clerks is almost unable to do so. It may chance that the person who is most pressed is competent; but if he is not competent, he is just as likely to secure the appointment. It is a common complaint by heads of bureaus that they are unable, under the present system, to secure competent clerks. I know an instance where the head of a department tried for years without success to fill three or four vacancies in his office with men of special qualifications.

We not only do not get competent clerks, but a great many more clerks are forced upon the service than are really needed. I find that in the Treasurer's office alone there have been 640 removals, resignations, ctc., and 380 appointments during the last six years. The entire force of the office is now but 286. A part of the removals was on account of a permanent reduction of force, but the greater part were wanton removals to make places for new people. In a single year 146 people were removed and 141 appointed. The office was kept in a continual state of terror and anxiety, from which the public business suffered, to say nothing of the misery and injustice inflicted on individuals.

Testimony of Edward O. Graves before a committee of Congress in 1882:

As intimated in my last report, I have endeavored to improve the civil service within the departmental service by a system of promotions and the equalization of salaries to labor performed. This plan went into operation July 1, 1881. It has succeeded so well that I have concluded, after consultation with a number of the postmasters of the leading cities, to extend a similar scheme to all post-offices with fifty or more employees, and to ingraft it upon the railway mail, adjusting it to the present system of advancements by case examinations. From the smallest of the classified post-offices the workers will now begin to climb first through the various grades of the post-office to the railway mail, and finally to the Post-Office Department. Even the announcement of this plan has caused a new zeal. Since the Administration of President Grant there has been no competitive system of promotions in the Post-Office Department. Advancement in most cases was made on the personal solicitation of friends and not always by the merit of the applicant, so that not infrequently worthy clerks who deserved promotion were passed over in order to favor others less deserving. A great majority discovered that there was no recognition of merit and gave up the struggle for advancement. I felt certain that there was but one way to bring about the greatest state of efficiency in the clerical force, and that was to give to all the positive assurance that advancement or reduction, retention or dismissal, would depend solely upon themselves, and that all should have a fair chance.

Report of Postmaster-General Wanamaker, 1890:

The wise forbearance that had been exercised by most of our former Presidents had left in the several subordinate stations a body of trained and experienced men, who possessed the knowledge of official business essential to the successful working of any government, and who were, in general, men of unexceptional characters. This degree of permanency of official life in Washington formerly had an important influence on the presperity and growth of the city, for men who felt that they were secure in their places so long as they properly discharged their duties to the Government could afford to seek permanent homes for their families where their salaries were earned. All this was suddenly changed; and it was changed with a disregard of the claims of meritorious public servants, and with the employment of excuses to effect their removal from office on which all candid men, of whatever political connection, must now look back with regret and disapprobation as a course alike unworthy of those who then assumed the administration of the Government and injurious to the future welfare of the country.

The influence of this new method of administration on the material prosperity of the city of Washington was the least of the evils that attended it. The opponents of President Jackson's government saw in it a long train of public mischiefs, and scarcely any wise man will now question that they were right.—Life of Daniel Webster, by G. T. Curtis, Volume I, pages 347 and 348.

PLATFORM UTTERANCES ON THE SUBJECT OF CIVIL-SERVICE REFORM.

The first platform declaration in favor of reform in the civil service is found in the platform adopted by the national Republican convention held at Philadelphia June 5, 1872, as follows:

Any system of the civil service under which the subordinate positions of the Government are considered rewards for mere party zeal is fatally demoralizing, and we therefore favor a reform of the system by laws which shall abolish the evils of patronage and make honesty, efficiency, and fidelity the essential qualifications for public positions, without practically creating a life tenure of office.

This was followed by the declaration of the Democratic party in national convention held in Baltimore on July 9, 1872, as

The civil service of the Government has become a mere instrument of partisan tyranny and personal ambition and object of selfish greed. It is a scandal and reproach upon free institutions and breeds a demoralization dangerous to the perpetuity of Republican government. We therefore regard a thorough reform of the civil service as one of the most pressing necessities of the hour; that honesty, capacity, and fidelity constitute the only valid claim to public employment; that the offices of the Government cease to be a matter of arbitrary favoritism and patronage, and that public station become again a post of honor. To this end it is imperatively required that no President shall be a candidate for reelection.

In the Republican platform adopted by the national Republican convention held at Cincinnati June 14, 1876, is the following declaration:

Under the Constitution the President and heads of Departments are to make nominations for office; the Senate is to advise and consent to appointments, and the House of Representatives is to accuse and prosecute faithless officers. The best interest of the public service demands that these distinctions be respected; that Senators and Representatives who may be judges and accusers should not dictate appointments to office. The invariable rule in appointments should have reference to the honesty, fidelity, and capacity of the appointees, giving to the party in power those places where harmony and vigor of administration require its policy to be represented, but permitting all others to be filled by persons selected with sole reference to the efficiency of the public service and the right of all citizens to share in the honor of rendering faithful service to the country.

The national Democratic convention held at St. Louis June 27, 1876, made the following declaration:

27, 1876, made the following declaration:

Reform is necessary in the civil service. Experience proves that efficient, economical conduct of the Government business is not possible if its civil service be subject to change at every election, be a prize fought for at the ballot box, be a brief reward of party zeal instead of posts of honor assigned for proved competency, and held for fidelity in the public employ; that the dispensing of patronage should neither be a tax upon the time of all our public men nor the instrument of their ambition.

The national Republican convention held at Chicago June 2, 1880, made the following declaration:

The Republican party, adhering to the principles affirmed by its last national convention of respect for the constitutional rules governing appointments to office, adopts the declaration of President Hayes that the reform of the civil service should be thorough, radical, and complete. To this end it demands the cooperation of the legislative with the executive department of the Government, and that Congress shall so legislate that fitness, ascertained by proper practical tests, shall admit to the public service.

The national Democratic convention of 1880, held at Cincinnati June 22, declared as follows:

We execrate the course of this Administration in making places in the civil service a reward for political crime, and demand a reform by statute which shall make it forever impossible for the defeated candidate to bribe his way to the seat of the usurper by billeting villains upon the people.

The national Republican convention held at Chicago June 3, 1884, made the following declaration:

Reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under Republican administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the objects of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectively avoided.

The national Democratic convention held in Chicago July 8, 1884, made the following declaration:

We favor honest civil-service reform and a compensation of all United States officers by fixed salaries.

The national Republican convention held at Chicago June 21, 1888, declared as follows:

The reform of the civil service, auspiciously begun under the Republican Administration, should be completed by the further extension of the reform system already established by law to all the grades of the service to which it is applicable. The spirit and purpose of the reform should be observed in all executive appointments, and all laws at variance with the object of existing reform legislation should be repealed, to the end that the dangers to free institutions which lurk in the power of official patronage may be wisely and effectually avoided.

The national Democratic convention held in St. Louis June 7, 1888, made the following declaration:

Honest reform in the civil service has been inaugurated and maintained by President Cleveland, and he has brought the public service to the highest standard of efficiency, not only by rule and precept, but by the example of his own untiring and unselfish administration of public affairs.

The national Republican convention held at Minneapolis June 7, 1892, declared as follows:

We commend the spirit and evidence of reform in the civil service and the wise and consistent enforcement by the Republican party of the laws regulating the same.

The national Democratic convention of 1892, held at Chicago June 21, made the following declaration:

Public office is a public trust. We reaffirm the declaration of the Democratic convention of 1876 for the reform of the civil service, and we call for the honest enforcement of all laws regulating the same.

Republican platform as adopted on the 16th of June, 1896, reads:

The civil-service law was placed on the statute book by the Republican party, which has always sustained it, and we renew our repeated declarations that it shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever

Democratic platform of July 7, 1896, reads:

We are opposed to life tenure in the public service except as provided in the Constitution. We favor appointments based on merit, fixed terms of office, and such an administration of the civil-service laws as will afford equal opportunities to all citizens of ascertained fitness.

Mr. McKinley said in his letter of acceptance:

The pledge of the Republican national convention that our civil-service laws shall be sustained and "thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable" is in keeping with the position of the party for the past twenty-four years, and will be faithfully observed. * * * The Republican party will take no backward step upon the question. It will seek to improve, but never degrade, the public service.

Upon another occasion the same distinguished standard bearer of the Republican party, who will have control of the civil service of this country after the 4th of March next, declared that the civilservice law was a Republican measure. It was in this House in 1890 that he made this declaration, when the annual attempt was made to cripple the civil service by cutting down the appropriation to carry it into effect:

It is a Republican measure, and is in accord with the highest and best sentiments of the country, and no party will have the courage to wipe it from the statute book or to amend it, save in the direction of its improvement. The Republican party must take no step backward. The merit system is here and it is here to stay, and we may just as well understand and accept it now and give our attention to correcting the abuses, if any exist, and improving the law wherever it can be done to the advantage of the public service.

A compilation of statistics prepared by Mr. Theodore L. De Land for the Civil Service Commission showing the exact state of the classified and unclassified parts of the executive civil service of the United States, so arranged as to include positions by Departments, offices, and commissions, with subdivisions by grades, the compilation containing a complete list of all positions, whether classified by compensation, whether appointed by the President solely or by confirmation of the Senate, whether the positions are in the classified service and excepted from examination, whether they are in the unclassified service by reason of their exclusion, whether they are mere laborers and unclassified, or whether they are positions classifiable but not yet classified.

THE GENERAL REPORT ON THE STATISTICS PERTAINING TO THE EXECUTIVE CIVIL-SERVICE CLASSIFICATION UNDER THE PRESIDENT'S ORDER OF MAY 6 AND NOVEMBER 2, 1896.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION, Washington, D. C., November 13, 1896.

Washington, D. C., November 13, 1896.

The President Civil Service Commission, Washington, D. C.

Sir: I have the honor to report to the Civil Service Commission that I have completed the compilation of the statistics which show approximately an official statement of the number of civil officers of the United States confirmed by the Senate above classification, the number of classified persons by classification, the number of excepted places, the number excluded from classification, the number of laborers or workmen below classification, and the number of positions not yet classified carried on the rolls of the Executive Mansion, the Executive Departments, and the bureaus, offices, and commissions of that service, whether compensated by a fixed salary or otherwise, inside or outside the District of Columbia, in most cases as the numbers and amounts stood on the average for the last fiscal year, which ended June 30, 1896.

The Treasury Department very courteously printed the blank devised at

The Treasury Department very courteously printed the blank devised at the Commission, on which the tables submitted herewith were prepared, and furnished the supply used in the work.

It was not practicable to classify by compensation positions in the navy-yards and naval stations, so far as the work relates to positions classified by the Navy Department, under regulations of that Department which were approved by the Commission and by the President. . . *

Since the tables were submitted by the proper officers they have in many cases been modified by them, and will of necessity be modified more or less cases been modified by them, and will or necessity be modified more or less hereafter.

Many offices and some Departments did not retain duplicates of their classifications. The opinion was general that the Commission might print the tables as an appendix to its annual report, and thus exhibit the general condition of the executive civil service at the period of the greatest extension of tion of the executive civil service at the period of the greatest extension of the rules.

There are urgent historical reasons why the tables should be printed; they have been collated and compiled at a great expenditure of time, and in their present condition are inaccessible to all except those with the Commission.

A general review of the tables will be found in the following skeleton:

The fact that Indians now occupy certain subordinate positions carries the positions occupied by them into the excepted list. If in the future it should be desired to fill any of those positions by whites, such positions would by that act go into the competitive list; but if filled by whites and desired to be filled by Indians, that act would carry those places from the competitive to the excepted list so long as filled by Indians. It will thus be noticed that by the operation of the rule the excepted places filled by Indians may be increased to the full limit of certain subordinate employees in the Indian service—at agencies and schools—if it were possible to fill those places with Indians. The rule allows positions in the Indian service other than superintendents, teachers, teachers of industries, kindergartners, and physicians to be filled by Indians.	Signal Service at large

Here a message from the Senate was received, and the committee rose. The Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Hepburn, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9643, the legislative appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, before the House again goes into Committee of the Whole, there are a couple of Senate amendments to the prepart deficiency bill which I should like to be preparted.

to the urgent deficiency bill which I should like to have concurred

Mr. BROSIUS. It is understood that I shall have the floor when the committee resumes its session.

Mr. CANNON. That is understood.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 9753, the urgent deficiency bill.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Page 3, strike out lines 12, 13, and 14. Page 5, after line 2, insert: "Senate: For folding speeches and pamphlets, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, $5,523.07."

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether any change has been made in the appropriation for the penitentiary at Leavenworth?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

On motion of Mr. BINGHAM, by unanimous consent, leave was granted to members to print remarks in the RECORD in connection with the legislative appropriation bill, the privilege being limited to ten days.

GEORGE JOHNSON.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand House bill No. 4281, in which two informal amendments have been made by the Senate. I move to concur in those amendments.

The amendments were read, as follows:

In line 8, after "Infantry," insert "in lieu of that he is now receiving."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act granting an increase of pension to George Johnson, of Lenox, Iowa."

The amendments were concurred in.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the vote be taken upon the legislative appropriation bill and all amendments thereto at 3 o'clock to-day, or earlier if debate shall sooner close.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I hardly think that motion is in order now. The Committee of the Whole have given the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] unlimited time, and agraph under consideration, and it was distinctly understood when the gentleman's time was extended that we should have an opportunity to do so. General debate on the paragraph has not been closed.

Mr. BINGHAM. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. BINGHAM. How much time does the gentleman want?
Mr. RICHARDSON. The general debate has not been closed, and I insist that we on this side should have a few minutes' time after the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] has con-

Mr. BINGHAM (to Mr. BROSIUS). How much more time does my colleague desire to occupy?

Mr. BROSIUS. I should be very glad to limit myself if I knew to what extent I am to be interrupted by interrogations, but after having been so kindly indulged by the committee, I do not feel at liberty to decline such interruptions.

Mr. BINGHAM. Can not the gentleman reach some conclu-

Mr. BROSIUS. I will conclude at the earliest moment I can.
Mr. BINGHAM. I trust the gentleman will name some definite hour, so that the House can reach a conclusion.
Mr. BROSIUS. As far as I am concerned, the vote can be taken at 3 o'clock; but I can not tell what other gentlemen may have to

Mr. RICHARDSON. If the gentleman will conclude at half past 2 o'clock, I am willing that the vote shall be taken at 3.

Mr. BINGHAM. Can my colleague conclude at that time?

Mr. BROSIUS. I can, if nobody takes up my time by interruptions, but gentlemen will see my difficulty in refusing to answer questions, after the kind indulgence I have received from the committee with the distinct understanding that I would yield for unsertions. questions.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then, Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion.
Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know the exact terms of the proposition upon which the question is now submitted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for further that, he moves that all debate on the pending bill, and, pending that, he moves that all debate on the pending bill be closed and the vote be taken at 3 o'clock.

Mr. TERRY. Does the gentleman submit that proposition as a motion, or is unanimous consent asked?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not quite sure in what form the gentleman submits it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire unanimous consent. The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent.

unanimous consent.

Mr. TERRY. I object.
Mr. BINGHAM. Then I make the motion.
Mr. RICHARDSON. Then a quorum will be required to carry it. We are not going to be cut off after the gentleman from Pennsylvania has occupied the whole time to-day and yesterday.
Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Would not the gentleman be satisfied to vote at half past 3?
Mr. RICHARDSON. I can not consent to that, if other gentlemen are to occupy all the time.
Mr. BROSIUS. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] will correct the statement he just made.
Mr. RICHARDSON. What statement?
Mr. BROSIUS. The gentleman certainly did not mean to say what he did. I understood him to complain that "the gentleman from Pennsylvania"—referring, as I understood, to myself—had occupied the whole of yesterday on this proposition.
Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, no. I said the gentleman had the whole time yesterday on this proposition—whole time yesterday on this proposition

Mr. BROSIUS. Not at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And, after farming out ten minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. EVANS], he asked to have the remainder of us cut off from debate. The gentleman remembers

Mr. BROSIUS. As the gentleman knows, the committee rose. I had no control over that. Let us be just and fair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think we agree exactly as to the facts.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Would not the gentleman from Tennessee consent to have a vote taken at half past 3?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will close his remarks at half past 2.

Mr. TERRY. I think the time had better be left indefinite for the present. All the talk thus far, or substantially all, has been on the other side. Now let us go into committee and see how much on the other side. Now let us go into committee and see how much time members may desire to occupy in further discussion. The gentleman from Tennessee on my right [Mr. RICHARDSON] is the only gentleman on our side who seems to manifest any desire to speak. But something may be said, as the debate progresses, which some of the rest of us may want to answer.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will an hour be ample for gentlemen on that side?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That would be satisfactory to me-an hour on this side.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Then I move that at the end of one hour after the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] closes his remarks we proceed to vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of one hour from the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius], who is now entitled to the floor in Committee of the Whole, a vote be taken, unless the debate should conclude earlier.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That will be entirely satisfactory, provided this side of the House is allowed to control that hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee desires, as a part of the arrangement, that the hour be controlled on his side of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is all right.
The SPEAKER. With that qualification, is there any objection to the proposition?

Mr. TERRY. I object. Let us go into the Committee of the Whole, and see what may be done there in the way of discussion. We on this side are not going to be unreasonable; but I do not like to enter into a "blind-pool" arrangement.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. You will have an hour under this

Mr. WILLIAM A. SIONE. You will have an nour under this proposition: that ought to be satisfactory.

Mr. TERRY. I do not know but what a number of gentlemen here may want to say something.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Your side will have one hour after the gentleman from Pennsylvania gets through.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] desire to enforce his objection?

Mr. TERRY. Yes, sir. I desire that we go into Committee of the Whole and let the general debate run along. It may be that none of us on this side will want to speak. I am not going to be unreasonable; but we do not like to tie our hands in this way.

That is the point.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move, then, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to resume the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. BROSIUS. If it will in any way help my colleague in charge of the bill to bring the bill to a vote this afternoon, as I understand he desires, I will yield the floor at this moment and allow anyone who may wish it to occupy the floor for a reasonable time, not exceeding an hour. The meaning of my proposition is this: I will yield the floor at this moment for the sake of assisting my colleague to bring the House to a vote upon this bill. But if my yielding the floor will not result in that, then I do not desire to yield it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will gentlemen on the other side accept the proposition of my colleague [Mr. Brostus]?

Mr. TERRY. I did not understand the last proposition.

Mr. BINGHAM. My colleague states that he is willing to yield the floor at once, in order that gentlemen on the other side may proceed with the discussion.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. For a full hour.

Mr. TERRY. At the suggestion of some of my colleagues, I will assent to the proposition which has been made.

Mr. BROSIUS. I ask unanimous consent that when the House goes into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of again considering this measure a vote be taken at 3 o'clock. That will allow three-quarters of an hour for further discussion. For the purpose of making an arrangement agreeable to those gentlemen who desire to address the House, I will yield the floor at this time.

Mr. BINGHAM. The suggestion was for one hour, if my colleague will permit me.

Mr. BROSIUS. Very well; I will make it one hour.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be directed to close the general debate on the legislative appropriation bill in one hour, and come to a vote thereon, with the understanding that he has presented to the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. BINGHAM was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. Hepburn in the chair.
Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I shall desire to occupy the attention of the committee more than one-half of the time that has been allotted to me, and if other gentlemen wish to address the committee it will give me a great deal of pleasure to yield them a portion of the time, provided I am allowed by the committee to control it.

I want to make one or two observations in respect to some declarations that were made in the committee on yesterday afternoon by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Evans], as well as those which have been made to-day by the able and accomplished chairman of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service [Mr. Bro-

I want to address myself for a little while to the charge that was asserted with a great deal of vehemence that the alterations or changes made in the Railway Mail Service early in the Administration of Mr. Harrison, beginning March 15, 1889, and extending through the first six weeks of his Administration, made this service vastly more efficient than it had been under the previous Administration.

I am not mistaken when I say that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who assumes to be very familiar with all of the facts in connection with this matter, asserted with marked vehemence that these changes in the service had made that service decidedly more efficient. Am I mistaken? He said it had become inefficient under the first Administration of President Cleveland and in a chaotic condition, and to improve its condition, to remedy that inefficiency, it had become necessary that these changes should be made, and he said that the records would sustain him in that charge. He said further that the record of the number of errors reported in the Railway Mail Service sustained him in the asser-He said further that the record of the number of errors tion he had made.

Now, fortunately for the truth of history, and unfortunately for the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I have at hand the record of the errors which occurred in the Railway Mail Service for the years immediately preceding the advent of Mr. Harrison into office, and the errors which occurred in the years following his advent into office, and this record does not sustain him. Let us see if the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is borne out by the record.

Mr. BROSIUS. If the gentleman will allow me a correction of his statement, the only figures I assumed to be able to give referred to the ratio of pieces of mail matter handled, and the errors committed in the handling of them at the time the change was made, or about that time, and the ratios of pieces handled and the errors committed at this time, or up to a short time ago, and I gave the figures as they appear. I did not pretend to do so for the intervening period. If I am incorrect in that statement I desire to be corrected, and will thank the gentleman from Tennessee for setting me right.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I propose to show, Mr. Chairman, from the records that the ratio of errors committed to pieces of mail matter handled in the Railway Mail Service was very much greater matter handled in the Railway Mail Service was very much greater immediately following the changes made by Mr. Harrison as compared with the service prior to that date.

Mr. BROSIUS. My friend must remember that I gave no figures. I gave my impression that the service was benefited in the manner I had suggested.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But you made the positive statement, and not your impression, that the changes had impaired the efficience of the empires.

ciency of the service.

Mr. BROSIUS. I meant to assert, and think I did, that the suspension of the order improved the service.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly; and therefore that the changes must have made the service, according to your contention, much better. Now, let us see if the gentleman is correct. I say he is

I have a table showing the pieces of mail matter distributed and handled since July 1, 1883, down to 1890. I ask your attention, if

In 1884, there were 4,519,661,900 pieces of mail matter handled. The number of errors committed in 1884 amounted to 1,167,223. There was an increase of errors in 1884 over the previous year of 208,745. Now, that is the last year of Mr. Cleveland's Administration

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, no; the first year of his Administration. Mr. RICHARDSON. I meant to say that it was the last year of the Administration immediately preceding Mr. Cleveland's.

Mr. BROSIUS. I made no statement in reference to any period of service, except that time of the suspension of Mr. Cleveland's order and from that time down to the present moment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I shall refer to that in a moment. I have this table here, embracing all of the years 1885, 1886, 1887, down to 1890, but I will not take the time of the committee to read them all. I shall content myself with reference only to that point which answers emphatically the statement of the gentleman from Penn-

Now, on the 4th of January, 1889, President Cleveland issued a proclamation putting the Railway Mail Service under the civil-service rules. This order was to take effect on the 15th of March. He went out of office on the 4th of March. On the 11th of March, before the order became operative, Mr. Harrison suspended its effect until the 1st day of May. I want to show, first, the number of changes made by Mr. Harrison and his Railway Mail Superintendent during that time, and then I will come to the effect it had upon the service. Between March 15, 1889, and April 30, 1889, about six weeks, the time to which he suspended the operation of this order, there were 1,436 removals in the Railway Mail Service. For the same length of time the preceding year, under Mr. Cleveland, there were 54 removals. For the same period for 1887, two years before, there were 45 removals. For the same time in the preceding year there were 85 removals, and in 1885, the first year of his Administration, during the same period there were only 51 removals. When Mr. Harrison came into office and made this suspension which I have mentioned of the civil-service order of Mr. Cleveland, there were within six weeks, as I say, 1,436 removals and 216 resignations—the resignations possibly forced ones. What happened in the corresponding period of the next year?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. How many removals were there during Mr. Cleveland's whole term of office?

Mr. RICHARDSON. During his whole four years he made 51 the first year, 85 the second, 45 the third, and 54 the fourth. The gentleman can add them up. There were 235 in all. And yet in less than six weeks Mr. Benjamin Harrison made 1,436 removals and received 216 resignations, nearly 1.700 in the short space of six weeks. Yet my friend from Kentucky [Mr. Evans] talked about "padding the service" before he put the civil service into operation down in Kentucky in some cases that he referred to.

Mr. EVANS. What case was that?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I should like to know if it was not particularly that the control of the co

I should like to know if it was not padding that Mr. Harrison did.

Mr. EVANS. The case that I referred to was not in Kentucky, but in this city, and not by the President.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It does not matter by whom it was done. I am not defending the President necessarily, but I am trying to show the outrage that was then perpetrated. Now, Mr. Chairman, I present the table showing these changes:

Gentlemen come and say that in some one Department of this Government to-day there are more Democrats than Republicans. The Secret Service, I believe, is the only instance cited, but I venture to say that 70 per cent of the departmental officers in the city of Washington are to-day Republicans. And why is it? When the civil-service law was first put upon the statute books, there was not a Department or bureau, or division in any bureau, in this Government presided over by a Democrat. Every Department and every bureau was under the control of the Republicans, and it was natural that Republicans were in office. Therefore, when the civil-service law was passed at first, and spread over the Departments and included the employees then in the service of the Government, it was quite natural that a large majority of the Departments and included the employees then in the service of the Government, it was quite natural that a large majority of them were Republicans.

Mr. BROSIUS. Will my friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

Mr. BROSIUS. Does he know any means of ascertaining the ratio of the respective parties in the service of the Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I do not. I think a great many of them have no politics; but when you arraigned the Democratic party for having its followers in office I wanted to show that I know it is a fact, from information given me by employees, that a large percentage of the employees are Republicans. While the gentleman was speaking I cited the Weather Bureau. Now, if I were going to complain as a party man, my complaint would be that the President of my party has not taken quite as many places for his followers as he might have taken. I do not care to boast particularly that I am a spoilsman, but I would not have appointed Republicans to important places if I had been President.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE and Mr. BOWERS rose.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to get through with this idea; otherwise I shall not be able to express it. I made the statement while the gentleman was speaking, and I believe it to be true, that every chief in the Weather Bureau except one is a Republican, appointed by Mr. Cleveland: the chief clerk is also Republican. The Chief of the Bureau, a most efficient one, too, is a Republican, appointed by Mr. Cleveland; the chief clerk is also a Republican, appointed by the present Secretary of Agriculture, as I understand it.

as I understand it.

11. The Chairman, the complaint is made by these gentlemen of the inefficiency of the Railway Mail Service. They seem to overlook the fact that the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service is a Republican who has not been removed by President Cleveland.

12. Mr. BROSIUS. If my friend will allow me, he will remember 1 made no complaint of inefficiency in the Railway Mail Service.

13. On the contrary I undertook to show its creat officiency.

On the contrary, I undertook to show its great efficiency.

Mr. RICHARDSON. But you charged—and there is no use in trying to get away from it—you charged that these changes made by Mr. Harrison when he came into office—these changes unprec-edented in number, unparalleled in the history of Administrations— had made that service more efficient. That was your charge. I say that they are unparalleled and unprecedented, because if you take the same length of time—a period covering six weeks in 1889—it makes 1,436 removals. Take the same period in 1890, and there were only 27; in 1891, only 15; in 1892 there were only 26 removals; and in 1893, when Mr. Cleveland again came into office, during these six weeks there were only 16 removals. During the same period in 1894 there were only 30 removals, and in 1895 only 15 removals and in 1896, covering the same six weeks, only 18 removals. Now, how do you, as a civil-service reformer, account for the fact that within the first six weeks of Mr. Harrison's term, immediately upon his suspension of the civil-service order of President Cleveland, he put into the Railway Mail Service 1,436 clerks? The gentleman further went on to account for it—

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly; but I would prefer to get through with my statement.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Do you not remember, in charging this all to the President's failures, that there are a large number of Democrats who are not in accord with the President?

Mr. RICHARDSON. You are after having some wit or fun.
I know my friend is always very facetious.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman to permit me to make a correction of what I said. I said that these three out of five were Democrats who were restored. They were men who had been removed by President Havingson. who had been removed by President Harrison and were restored. I wanted to correct that statement, instead of saying that they were men removed by President Cleveland.

men removed by President Cleveland.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to print in part of my remarks a table which will show exactly what I have said.

The next question that I wish to address myself to—these changes being unparalleled, and which the gentleman did not undertake to account for—is, How did they affect the Railway Mail Service? How are we to ascertain this fact? By taking the number of pieces handled, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said. I have a table which shows this. I propose to read from the Congressional Record, and from the debate which will be found in the Record on page 7787. Fifty-third Congress, July 21, 1894. the Record on page 7787, Fifty-third Congress, July 21, 1894. This table was placed in the Record by Mr. Bynum, of Indiana, then a member of this House. And what does it show? It shows that instead of making the service more efficient, this act of Mr. Harrison's and the changes mentioned made it inefficient.

Harrison's and the changes mentioned made it inefficient.

Let us see if I am not correct in that. In 1888, the last year of Mr. Cleveland's Administration, there were 6,528,000,000 pieces of matter handled by the railway mail clerks. The number of errors were 1,765,821. In 1889, immediately following these changes made by Mr. Harrison, the number of pieces handled by the Railway Mail Service increased to 8,026,837,130; the number of errors increased to 1,777,295. In 1890, under these clerks, the first full year of the service of the new clerks, the number of errors increased from 1,777,395 to 2,769,345, an increase in errors from 11,474 from the last year of Mr. Cleveland's Administration to 991,950 errors under these new clerks, put in to benefit the service in the railway mail department. mail department. Here is the table:

Table of pieces of mail distributed, etc., annually since July 1, 1883.

Year end- ing June 30—	Number of pieces distributed.	Increase.	Number of errors.	Increase of errors.	Decrease of errors.	Number correct to each error.
1884 1885 1886 1887 1888 1889 1890	4,519,661,900 4,948,059,400 5,329,521,475 5,834,690,875 6,528,772,060 8,026,837,130 7,847,723,600	538, 145, 620 428, 397, 500 381, 462, 075 505, 479, 398 694, 081, 185 498, 065, 070 820, 886, 470	1, 167, 228 887, 704 1, 260, 443 1, 734, 617 1, 765, 821 1, 777, 295 2, 769, 245	208, 745 372, 739 474, 174 31, 204 11, 474 991, 950	279,519	3, 872 5, 575 4, 228 3, 364 3, 694 3, 954 2, 834

Now, I want the gentleman from Pennsylvania to tell us if he had examined the record when he made his statement that the number of pieces showed that the service had been made more efficient by these changes.

Mr. TRACEY. Is there not a decrease in the percentage of errors?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is an increase.
Mr. TRACEY. That is a decrease.
Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; I will show you how it is. Mr. RICHARDSON. No, Sir; I will show you how it is. The number of pieces handled to one error in 1888 was 3,694; in 1889, to 3,954 pieces handled to one error, the largest number—

Mr. TRACEY. That was a decrease in the percentage.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was an increase. There were more

Mr. TRACEY. Read that over again.
Mr. RICHARDSON. I will read it over again.
Mr. TRACEY. You will find it is a decrease in the percentage of error

Mr. RICHARDSON. But you should wait until I make the Mr. RICHARDSON. But you should wait until I make the statement in full. There were 3,364 pieces handled to one error in 1887; there were 3,694 in 1888; 3,954 in 1889; and in 1890, the first full year under Harrison, there were only 2,834 pieces handled to each error. For every 2,834 pieces handled by these new clerks put in to benefit the service, and to bring it out of chaos, there was an error; and under Mr. Cleveland they handled 3,700 pieces in round numbers to an error.

Mr. TRACEY. Thirty-nine hundred in 1889.
Mr. RICHARDSON. Thirty-nine hundred in 1889.
Mr. TRACEY. That is the first year of the new Administra-

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of which year most of the work was done by the old clerks.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes. During the first full year of Harrison's Administration for every 2,834 pieces handled there was 1 error, according to this record

Mr. TRACEY. That was an increased percentage, but in 1889

nere was a decrease.
Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Bynum said further, and I repeat it

It will be seen from the foregoing table that in 1885, the first year of Mr. Cleveland's Administration, there was an increase of nearly 500,000,000 pieces distributed, and a decrease in the number of errors of nearly 300,000. In 1884 there were 3.872 pieces correctly handled to each error, while in 1885 there were 5.875 pieces correctly handled to each error. During the year 1885, the last wholly under Democratic Administration, 7,023,837,130 pieces were handled, with a total of 1,777,235 errors.

I ask the gentleman to keep that in his mind.

Mr. COX. Will my colleague yield to me for one question? Mr. RICHARDSON. Certainly.

What was the number of errors committed before Mr. COX. the civil-service law was applied in that branch of the public

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have shown that in the last year of Mr. Cleveland's Administration, before the civil service was applied, 5,575 pieces were handled for each error. When the applied, 5,575 pieces were handled for each error. When the service was put under the civil-service law under Mr. Harrison, when these "more efficient" clerks that we have heard about were appointed, there was 1 error to about every 2,800 pieces.

Mr. COX. So that before the civil service was applied less errors were committed than under the civil service?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is true.
Mr. TRACEY. But is it not true that the method of marking errors was almost wholly changed after the Harrison Administration came in, and that errors were then marked that had never been marked before, which would account largely for the increase of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There may have been some change made in the marking, but it would not account for the great increase in the number of errors.

Mr. TRACEY. Certainly it would increase the number.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Bynum, on the occasion when he made these remarks, read a large number of interesting letters bearing upon this subject, which are printed in the RECORD at page 7786. I will not stop to read them all, but I will read one to which I ask the attention of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius]. It is a description of the condition of affairs that existed between the 11th day of March, 1889, and the 1st day of May following, during which time there was this carnival that I have described this large number of dismissals.

The letter is from Waterville, Me., is addressed to Mr. Bynum, and is as follows:

WATERVILLE, ME., October 16, 1893.

WATERVILLE, ME., October 16, 1893.

DEAR SIR: I received a copy of the bill you introduced in the House a short time since, and I wish to say to you that the ex-postal clerks are very much pleased with your undertaking, and trust the bill may pass.

In their haste to remove us from the service they appointed one man who had been dead for more than one year, another who was nearly dead and who told the superintendent that he could not go back, he was too sick; but they made him go on, as they said, till they could straighten things out. He went on, and after a few months resigned, went home, and died.

Yours, respectfully,

Hon. WILLIAM D. BYNUM, Congressman, Washington, D. C.

It would seem that they could not get the changes made fast enough with the living, so that they actually appointed dead men and others who were nearly dead and not able to transact the business of the office, simply in order that they might have them "in;" and one of these letters says that these changes were made and inefficient Republicans appointed hurriedly, because it was easier to get rid of an inefficient Republican, and make a place for a more efficient one, than it would be to get rid of an efficient Democrat that they would wish to discharge later, to appoint a Republican.

Mr. BROSIUS.

Mr. BROSIUS. Who was the writer of that letter?
Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman did not give his name.
Mr. BROSIUS. Do you propose to place the responsibility upon President Harrison, or upon anyone else, by reading an anonymous

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did my friend direct that inquiry to his friend from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER], who read an anonymous letter here this morning, in his presence, in respect to the employees now in the Departments?

Mr. BROSIUS. I perceive the purpose of reading the letter which the gentleman from Tennessee has just read.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And I perceived the purpose of the gentleman from New Hampshire in reading his letter.

Mr. BROSIUS. My comment is that the letter is of no consequence whatever unless we know something about the writer of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Precisely; and I think the same is true of the letter read by the gentleman from New Hampshire this morning.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what I took the floor for was to show that the record does not bear out the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the statement he has made. It shows that the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Evans], when he said that somebody had padded the Departments here before covering them by the civil-service law, in order that there might be members of certain party in office when that law should take effect, might easily be paralleled.

The object of this debate has been perfectly apparent throughout. The object is to prepare the country for some sort of executive order or proclamation of the President who is to be inaugurated on the 4th day of March next in relation to employees who have been appointed under the present Administration and who are now protected by the civil-service rules which the gentleman from Pennsylvania lauds so loudly. It is to prepare for action of some sort by which those employees shall be displaced in order that the incoming Administration may have some spoils to give away to its followers. That, I say, is clearly the object, because when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. McCreary] addressed a question on that point to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that gentleman did not undertake to answer it in his usual ingenuous manner. So, Mr. Chairman, I conclude that the object is to prepare the country and to prepare us all for the great change which is to take place on the 4th day of March.

Now, when Mr. Harrison came into office in 1889, he found a civil-service order that was not completely executed. He found that he had until the 15th of March to "pad" the offices with Republican employees, but he saw that that was not sufficient time, and therefore he extended it. As I have already said, I have never been a radical civil-service reformer, but if the present distinguished Chief Executive, in his wisdom and in the exercise of the discretion given him by Congress, shall see fit to extend the civil-service rules over other divisions and bureaus of the public service, I trust he will make his proclamation operative or complete before the 4th day of March; and then we shall see whether our friends coming into power propose to stand by their own civil-service law which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROSIUS] praises so highly. And, I may add, we will see whether they live up to their platform upon which they nominated their candidate and made their canvass, not only in 1896, but in 1892 and 1888, I believe, for they have always declared in favor of civil-service reform.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Walker]. How much time does he desire?
Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Ten minutes.
Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman.
Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, if the results of the suspension of the order by President Harrison have been accurately stated in what has been presented to this House by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Richardson], I submit that no stronger evidence has been given on this floor in thorough condemnation of the spoils system than those facts; and if they do accurately represent the results of that suspension of that order, I think it will be a warning to the incoming President that he make no such mistake.

Now, with reference to all the evidence that has been presented to this House of the violation of the civil-service rules by the pre-ceding Administration to the present, and by the Administration which preceded that, I have to say that such evidence simply justifies the policy of our adhering to the civil-service rules.

And I wish to call the attention of the House and the country to this further fact, that when you depart from a system that is confessedly wrong in order to adopt a system that is confessedly right, you will have conclusive evidence to justify the departure from the wrong system and the adoption of the right system in the continuance of the spirit of the old, debauched, and condemned system, exhibited in the violation of the spirit of the new and reformed system, while conforming to its letter. Is there a man on this floor at this moment who will not say that I have accurately delineated what always happens in passing from bad practices to the good in the weakness of human nature?

I want to say, secondly, that this spoils system, this turning of men out of their employment because of their political belief, is more contemptible and barbarous and wicked almost than actual war. We have had a little illustration of that down in Pensacola, where the Government proposed to establish, and did establish, a navy-yard; and for that purpose a few hundred mechanics were taken down there. But less and less appropriations were made, until finally the yard was discontinued. And the descendants of those people, with the lethargy and inertia of human nature in pulling up and breaking off old relations and establishing new, have been so far unable to adjust themselves to their surroundings, until the children and grandchildren of those first-class mechanics have gone back nearly to the ignorance of what were called "poor white trash" of the South before the war.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, to this House and the country that the principle of civil service, the "merit rule," enters into and is the controlling principle in every well-regulated factory in the United States. There is no employer in this country within my knowledge who allows a man to be dismissed from his employment unless for cause—even though he may have become disabled by old age in many cases. Why, sir, I had a man in my employment old age in many cases. Why, sir, I had a man in my employment in a very important place whose peculiarities were such that he made it uncomfortable for me and uncomfortable somewhat for the men over whom he had direction—some hundred or more. But he was an honest, faithful, industrious, loyal, skillful man. Because of his peculiarities there never was a time during twenty secause of ms peculiarities there never was a time during twenty years when I would not have felt relieved and rejoiced if he had resigned his position; I would have given quite a sum of money to have had him do so. Yet he continued to hold his place until he died; he was never dismissed from my employment. I would have cut off my right hand before I would have dismissed him.

Mr. TERRY. Do I understand my friend from Massachusetts to say that the same rule is now applied in the civil service as in our factories?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I said nothing of the kind. I said that the true civil-service principle, employment and promotion for merit only, governs and controls in all our large fac-

I want to say another thing. At one time I went into a factory at Buffalo, and I saw sitting around there three or four men who at Bullaio, and I saw sitting around there three or four men who seemed to me to be superannuated men, who were accomplishing but little. I said to the employer, "Why do you keep those men?" Knowing our customs, I asked the question simply to see what he would say. "Why," replied he, "these men have been in my factory twenty, thirty, or forty years, and I would rather fail in my business than disturb them in their old age and bring distress upon their wives and children."

Mr. Chairman around right and a superiod of the superiod of the

Mr. Chairman, every right-minded man employing his fellows Mr. Chairman, every right-minded man employing his fellows considers that every man in his employ has a "vested right" in his job, and would no more remove him, if he could avoid it, than he would dispossess a neighbor on an adjoining realty in order that he might possess himself of his land. Employing as I did some five hundred or a thousand men, I was constantly approached by good women of the church that I attend, and by others, seeking a job for themselves or others these in when the removed in the church that I attend, and the church is seeking the control of the church that I attend, and by others, seeking the church that I attend, and by others, seeking the church that I attend the church the church that I attend the church the church that I attend the church the church that I attend the church the church that I attend the church that I attend the church that I attend the chur job for themselves or others, those in whom they were interested. I uniformly meet such applications by saying, as President Lincoln once said, "I have no influence in this administration; you must go to the foreman having charge of that branch of the business, and if he has a vacancy, you can undoubtedly get it. But no influence of mine shall disturb a man in my employ."

One other remark and I am done. I think there is nothing that know of more pernicious in the government of this country than the influence of Congressmen upon appointments of this country than the influence of Congressmen upon appointments of every name and nature. Why, sir, when a man is dismissed from office here in Washington for his political opinions, a man with wife and children about him, and perhaps an aged mother dependent upon him—his dependents, perhaps, in ill health—it is a heart-rending spectacle, whether the man be Democrat or Republican. It is damnable. You can not use any language that is strong worden to abstract raise such conduct enough to characterize such conduct.

Now, let me give you, on the other hand, an illustration of the nobility of some of these wage earners to whom I have referred. On one occasion a man came to me complaining that injustice had been done him by the very foreman of whom I spoke as not being the most pleasant man in his disposition. The man came to me and related his story. I said to him:

"It seems to me that your cause is just. It seems to me that injustice has been done to you. I will call down the foreman and investigate the case. I am afraid, I am very much afraid, that I shall find him guilty of having done you an injustice. I hate to do it. He has been in my employ for thirty years without any

"Now, I will submit the whole case to you and let you determine it yourself. I have rarely had complaint of his doing injustice to anybody heretofore. I have never really observed before that he actually had done injustice to any of the employees; but I will call him down and lay the matter before him. I will try the case impartially, and if he did, if I recognize the fact that he has been guilty of this offense, I must dismiss him. Discipline is gone if I restore you and do not dismiss him; but I will enter upon his

"But remember, if I displace him and put another man in his place, the new man may do injustice ten times where this man, against whom this complaint is made, has done it once. That he has done injustice to you I do not deny. Clearly it has been done. But what shall I do? I leave the matter entirely to you."

He took his hat in his hand, and said, "Mr. WALKER, I would rather leave the factory than have him dismissed," when I confronted him with the difficulties that beset me.

So, Mr. Chairman, we must expect that these wrongs against the spirit of the law will occur under the law, until public sentiment has grown to so justify the law and condemn the evasion of its spirit as to compel its enforcement. When that time comes there will be no infraction of its spirit any more than its letter. [Applause.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, before I address myself to the subject immediately under consideration-about which I the subject immediately under consideration—about which I know nothing and care less—I want to note a single observation which fell, accidentally, I hope, from the lips of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Walker] who has just taken his seat. He mentioned in a very pathetic manner an instance of the exodus of some worthy mechanics from New England, who went somewhere down to Florida, I think, and in the lapse of time they had degenerated "to the level of the poor white trash," among whom they found themselves." I had hoped, sir, that, whether consciously or unconsciously, these thoughts, of which the remark of the gentleman from Massachusetts was an unconscious reflection. had passed entirely out of the public mind in this country.

of the gentleman from Massachusetts was an unconscious reflec-tion, had passed entirely out of the public mind in this country, and that these little sectional flings and innuendoes had for all time ceased to be bantered about between us.

I might say in response to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the phrase he uses, "poor white trash," is never used in the South except by the negroes or novelists. I might say, in response to what he has said, that if the mechanics of New England whom he mentioned fell to the level of the people among whom they had come, it violated my observation of the fact that they are already at or below that level before they leave New England.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me an instant?

Mr. WILLIAMS. A word, if you please, before yielding to the gentleman.

I rose, Mr. Chairman, principally because it struck me that that remark of the gentleman ought to be noticed, and also to remind the gentleman from Massachusetts of the fact, which I know to be a fact, that this class of poor people in the South to whom he refers as 'poor white trash" are the most magnificent raw material out of which to make superb manhood and womanhood that exists to-day anywhere on the face of the globe.

I would remind the gentleman and the committee that the only Americanism to-day in the United States, pure and unmixed, is to be found in the South. I would remind him that from the "poor white trash," if he will so designate them, and from amongst the poorest and "trashiest" of them sprang such men as Henry Clay and Andrew Jackson, and also that there has sprung from that very type Abraham Lincoln himself. I would remind him that from the very class of these poor white trash of the South Lincoln got his magnificent courage, his magnificent sense of humor and sympathy with humanity, and all that made him an American, and not merely a Western man, or an Eastern man, or a Southern man. The very bone of his bone and sinew of his sinew, the blood that was in him, was of the South; and it was to the poor white trash of the South that he owed character as well as his origin. And the same is true of Andrew Jackson; the same is true of Henry Clay, and it has been true, Mr. Chairman, of nearly every "tribune of the people" who has adorned American civilization and made American history.

So much for that fling of the gentleman from Massachusetts. Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I deny, Mr. Chairman, having made any such fling, and want to say that nothing could be any more unjust to me than the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to be unjust to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I said in the beginning that the expression dropped, perhaps, unconsciously from his lips.
Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But whatever may be the feeling of the people of New England, whether they speak them openly or indulge them unconsciously, the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts was doubtless an expression of habitual thought. Now, my friends, upon the question which is before the House I have only this to say: Is there a man in my presence who, put in charge of a great commercial or manufacturing business, would for one moment, as a man of common sense, undertake to conduct it upon a system of competitive book examinations?

There is a system of civil service which is right and which ought to be put in operation. The employees of the Government ought to be put in office for a fixed term and for a long term, not coinciding with the Presidential or party term, and they ought to be kept in office during good behavior during that time, not to be removed during the term except for cause set forth and proven, if you please. They ought to hold their offices as a sheriff or a clerk does in a State administration; but to undertake to carry on any sort of serious business on the principle that men are competent to carry it on in proportion to their ability to answer schoolbook questions is a piece of utter folly. I think that there ought to be a pass examination; in other words, that no man ought to be per-mitted to enter the service of the Government unless he presents a certain degree of intelligence; and the fact as to whether he possesses it or not could be arrived at by some sort of practical as well as theoretical examination. After that appointment he ought not to be removed for politics and politics solely. He ought to be removed only for cause, and cause stated, and ought to hold the office for a given length of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I give the gentleman four minutes longer, if he desires it. May I ask how much time I have left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] has ten minutes.

ARDSON] has ten minutes. .

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I ask for two or three minutes in which to reply to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I promised the gentleman from California

[Mr. Bowers] five minutes. I now give the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] four minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, to address myself rapidly to the question from a common sense standpoint, first, I lay down the proposition that no man would carry on a great business upon this system. Then I say that when you come to consider its practical effects in the Government you find that it leads to a bureaucracy. It leads to a more nearly perfect effectiveness in the clerical administration of the public service. You may go to Prussia to-day, and you will find nowhere on the face of the globe more effective public service than there. The man is mad who would deny that the civil-service system leads to a greater clerical and technical effectiveness upon the part of the employees. That is undoubtedly true. But you are obtaining effectiveness of work on the part of employees, effectiveness of clerical work, at the sacrifice of a great democratic principle. I use the word democratic spelled with a small "d" and not a big one—not in a partisan sense. You are sacrificing the idea that there must not be in a democratic Republic a class set aside by itself with no interest in common with the people, but that your official class ought to be a class that comes out periodically from the body of the people and goes back periodically into the body of the people, never losing this oneness of interest, this identity of purpose which the citizens should have under the Government.

That is not all. This system leads to another thing. After these officials are kept in for an indefinite length of time old age these officials are kept in for an indefinite length of time old age makes them ineffective in the service, and just when they become least effective they become most capable of appealing to the sympathies of their superiors and of everybody else to keep them in the service. People say, "Why, it would be a shame and a disgrace to discharge this old man or old woman who is unable to make a living." They have been taught to depend upon the Government to the bitter end for their sustenance. Therefore, they have saved nothing from year to year, and when the dark days of old age come, then they appeal to be kept in the public service upon the ground of pure sympathy and nothing else. It can lead to nothing in ordinary love and charity and pity and mercy but that; it must lead to that if the system is perpetuated. Now, would it not be infinitely better to have them serve like sheriffs, clerks, and the officers of your State administrations, and when they have served their terms go back among the people and lift up their served their terms go back among the people and lift up their own burdens, as the other people do, and carry them bravely, as the other people do?

Mr. HARDY. For instance, change them with every Administration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I do not think so. I am just as far removed from the blind spoilsman as I am from the doctrinaire civil-service reformer. I believe in a fixed tenure of office, but not a life tenure. I believe in holding office for competency, but not for competency demonstrated by answering book questions alone. I do not believe anybody ought to be in the service unless his competency is shown by examinations, but I do not think that his grade of competency can be shown by grades or marks in answering questions. You all remember Tom Brown at Oxford. The dean asked him what the twenty-seventh article of the Church of England was, or something else, and he could not answer. The dean said, "Why, I could have answered that when I was 14 years of age, and you ought to be ashamed;" and Tom Brown's answer was, "I could have done it then, too." [Laughter.] So it is with a great deal of this examination stuff. The boy newest from school gets the place. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman to give me three minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I promised first the gentleman from

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Two minutes, then. Mr. RICHARDSON. I can not withdraw that promise.

Mr. BOWERS. I yield to the gentleman two minutes of my

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, again, that it is impossible for the great manufacturing and mercantile business of this country to be successfully conducted upon any other system as to their employees than the "merit system," absolutely and completely, from the head down. That is what we ask of this Government in its business.

we ask of this Government in its business.

Now, a word in reference to the poor "white trash" in the South. [Laughter.] I want to say to that gentleman that he knows, and knew when he began his remarks, that I made that reference in no spirit of casting any slur on or to revile any people, or of contempt for any people at all. But everybody knows that in the days of slavery there were a class of white people where were a class of white people whom were heavily and early hills who were leaded. that in the days of slavery there were a class of white people who were banished to the mountains and sand hills who were called "crackers" and "poor white trash." They were an object of pity by the slave owners and of contempt by the negro slaves. They could not read or write, and he knew all that. He knew, we all knew, of these people being stranded there, and he knows that I meant no slur upon any of this white class. We have ignorant people in the North also. And yet he replied that when Yankees came down South they were on a level with these people called "crackers" or "poor white trash." When he said that he cast a contempt on the people of the North that I did not cast upon the people of the South in any sense, committing a worse offense than he had even charged upon me.

Now, I want to say these people of the South were in that condition out of no want of humanity or anything else, but under political and economical conditions that, God be thanked, have passed away from the South never to return. [Applause.] I have no apologies to make to him or to anybody else for referring to that class, which class is well known in the history of that com-

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nobody knows the class except novelists and negroes.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will simply say—[laughter]—I will let that go as to the truthfulness of a man who will stand up in this place and say that.

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the merit system—the foundation of all successful business everywhere. But I am utterly opposed to this civil-service reform humbug that has lam utterly opposed to this civil-service reform humbug that has been foisted upon the American people by a few anglomaniacs. It is a system entirely at variance with the spirit and institutions of this Government. There is not a suspicion of Americanism about it. It is an imported English plant.

It is the first step—and a long one—toward the establishment of privileged classes in this country—a class privileged to hold office during life. The United States Senator, the Congressman State legislator, the lawymakers, must each and all go out of office.

State legislator, the lawmakers, must each and all go out of office at the end of a stated term, no matter how efficient and useful he may have become; but the great mass of those who must execute the laws are to be intrenched in their position, and through thorough organization will soon be able to dictate to every candidate for a legislative office.

This talk of taking the civil service out of politics is too stupid to deceive any but the most ignorant, and these are deceived by the continued chatter of civil-service advocates about "spoilsmen" and "spoils of office." There has been nothing but politics, and the most shameful politics—and spoils of office in this tics—and the most shameful politics—and spoils of office in this civil-service business for the last three and a half years.

No Executive ever went to such lengths to secure the spoils of office for his party and his personal adherents as the present prophet of civil-service reform. He has prostituted the system for this purpose only.

It seems clear that it was understood from the first that as soon as a Department was cleared of Republicans and Democrats substituted in their places it would be put under civil-service rules and the crowd commissioned for life and nailed hard and fast in office. In several of the Departments great celerity was manifested in the "weeding-out" process, and they were soon ready for the prophet's blessing.

But in the customs service this was slower, and he had to wait over three years before the weeding out of Republicans was accomplished; but the work was thoroughly done, and the protecting cloak of civil-service rules has been spread over it, and the present force empowered to pass upon the qualifications of anyone who may hereafter seek admission to the service.

The present Executive has carried into effect a shrewd scheme to keep in office indefinitely about 60,000 of his personal adherents and Democratic appointees after that party has been retired by the people by over a million majority.

There is still time for the President to extend the protection of civil-service reform in several directions, particularly as to the consular service of the United States, so that the few consuls of the United States who are not now foreigners may become so for all practical purposes.

It is generally believed that the President will not include the Cabinet officers in the batch to be covered with this voluminous civil-service cloak. These are about the only appointees now left that the Executive may appoint without the gracious permission of the Senate. It will be an act of self-restraint and courtesy on the part of the present Executive that will be highly appreciated by the President-elect, because every argument advanced for the extension of civil-service rules over other officers and employees applies with equal force to the Cabinet.

The logical, the inevitable, result of this civil-service system will be to give the country, in a few years, double the number of officers and employees necessary to do the public business. Very many of the employees are now well advanced in years, and in a very short time will be unable to perform the duties of their stations, but they must be kept on or pensioned and others appointed to do their work. This result any one can see is inevitable.

There is one other natural sequence of this life tenure of officers and employees. Being fortified in their positions, one of the strong incentives to be courteous and obliging in the discharge of their duties is removed; and this spirit of "What are you going to do about it," is too often manifested in the service already.

There should be no life tenure attached to any office in this country, except to Army and Navy offices, and it is warranted in these cases only because these officers must surrender absolutely and completely their personal liberty as well as a large part of the rights and privileges, and particularly the opportunities, common to the American citizens.

Make stated terms for all offices, and insure against removal during such term, except for sufficient cause arising from the administration of the office. That will be an American system-a administration of the office. That will be an American system—a true merit system.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to discuss this question at length, but as I made the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brosius] which brought up the discussion of the wrong that had been done in turning out railway-mail clerks, I wish to say that there was a bill introduced and referred to a committee of the House in the Fifty-third Congress to place on the eligible list for appointment in the Railway Mail Service the clerks who had been wrongfully discharged. I believe the bill passed the House, and I submit, to be incorporated into the Record, the report made upon that bill by an able, distinguished, and faithful Representative in that Congress, Mr. Goodnight, of Kentucky. It details many facts connected with the transaction, and goes far to show the manner in which the civil-service law was enforced by Mr. Harrison's Administration.

The report is as follows:

The report is as follows:

Mr. Goodnight, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the fol-[To accompany H. R. 4017.]

[To accompany H. R. 4017.]

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred House bill No4017, submit the following report:

On the 1st day of December, 1888, the President issued an order placing the Railway Mail Service under the regulations of the civil service on and after the 15th day of March, 1889. Rules governing the service were promulgated on the 4th of January, 1889. On the 11th day of March, 1889, president Harrison issued an order extending the time when the said order should take effect from the 15th day of March, 1889, to the 1st day of May, 1889. Appointments to the mail service prior to the time the same was placed in the classified service were made under regulations of the Department. These regulations restricted the age of appointees to 35 years and under, and required a probationary service of six months, during which time the efficiency of the applicant was tested by strict examinations before permanent appointment could be made. Under such regulations the service was supplied with very efficient clerks.

As the rules for the regulation of the service by the Commission that he made. Under such regulations the service was supplied with very efficient clerks.

As the rules for the regulation of the service by the Commission had been promulgated more than two months before the extension thereof by President Harrison, it seems that the said extension was made simply to enable the Department officials to remove those in the service, and to appoint others in their stead. From the 15th day of March to the 1st of May, 1889, more than one thousand removals were made and inexperienced parties appointed in their places. The changes made greatly reduced the efficiency of the service. The clerks dismissed during this interval were dismissed without cause, other than political, most of them having unquestioned records for efficiency. Not only were a large number of removals made during this period, but clerks whose services could not be dispensed with at that time were retained until the months of August and September and then dismissed, and their notice of dismissal dated April 29. Also, appointments were made in August and September, regardless of the civil-service regulations, by dating the orders therefor April 29.

It appears evident from the facts that the object of the extension of the time fixed by President Cleveland from the 15th of March till the 1st of May, 1889, was to enable the new administration to make changes and appointments for political reasons alone. The purpose of this bill is to authorize the Postmaster-General to reinstate any of the clerks removed between said dates whenever vacancies may occur without examination and certification by the Civil Service Commission. As the Postmaster-General has a complete record of the efficiency of all the clerks so removed, your committee is of the opinion that from this he can ascertain the qualifications of the applicants better than from any other source, and that these clerks who have prepared themselves and proven their efficiency should, for the good of the service, and in justice to themselves, be reinstated as vacancies may oc

Mr. RICHARDSON. How much time have I left, Mr. Chair-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.
Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas
[Mr. Neill].

Mr. NEILL. Mr. Chairman, I am well aware that it is very doubtful whether I could in any length of time greatly enlighten this body on the great subject of civil-service reform, and most certainly I can not do it in three minutes. I must say, however, that while we have had some fine declamation, and even eloquence, this afternoon, I have not perceived that this Chamber was very much illumined until just now, when the electric lights was very much illumined until just now, when the electric lights have been turned on. [Laughter.]

Judged by the standard of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Civil Service Reform, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Brostus], I doubt not that I would be classed as a "spoilsman," yet I am not opposed to the merit system or to efficiency in the public service. I believe in it. But, Mr. Chairman, when you talk about "spoilsmen" and about that "iniquitous" system, you ought to remember that it is the system that was in vocasin the days of Jackson and of Lincoln and their was in vogue in the days of Jackson and of Lincoln and their great compeers. Indeed, I think there has been a great deal of silly sentimentalism on the subject of civil-service reform—sentiment in which the great mass of the people of the United States do not take much stock. For my part, I take little interest in the question of how many removals President Harrison made, or how many removals President Cleveland has made. I have read the civil-service law, every line of it, time and again, and I have never found in it any restriction upon the right or power of removal from office, except that in certain instances men are not to be removed for refusing to do certain things. My understanding of the civil-service law is that it was intended to establish a system of competitive examination for men to get into the Government employ, but I have always thought that the back door was left open, and the only fault I have found with the present Chief Magistrate (whom, in a humble way, I helped to place in power) was that he did not turn enough of them out, as he had a right to do. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], I am opposed to life tenure of office. I subscribe to the doctrine of the Chicago convention of 1896, which opposes life tenure in office. I am aware that when I gave my adhesion and tenure in office. I am aware that when I gave my adhesion and support to the platform containing that among its provisions I subjected myself to the ordeal of being designated by gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber and their allies as an "anarchist," but, Mr. Chairman, although I may be classed on that side of the House as an anarchist, I am happy in the knowledge that there are nearly 7,000,000 of us "anarchists" in the United States. [Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report by paragraphs the portion of the bill under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For three Commissioners, at $3,500 each; chief examiner, $3,000; secretary, $2,000; eight clerks of class 4; ten clerks of class 3; thirteen clerks of class 1; fifteen clerks of class 1; three clerks, at $1,000 each; two clerks, at $900 each; one messenger; two laborers; engineer, $840; and two watchmen; in all, $91,340.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, striking out, beginning with line 7, down to and including line 15.

I also announce my purpose to offer an amendment striking out the second paragraph, from line 16 down to and including line 19, if it is in order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beginning with line 7, strike out down to and including line 15.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to address the committee on this amendment. Other members have expressed their views with reference to the civil-service law and the manner of its enforcement. I desire to say that I am opposed to the method of enforcing the civil-service law, and desire to vote to strike out from this bill the appropriations contained in this paragraph and from this bill the appropriations contained in this paragraph and to afford the House an opportunity of doing the same thing.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. BROSIUS. Before that motion is voted upon, Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word. I think it is suitable to direct the attention of this committee, especially of the Republicans of the committee, and more particularly the attention of my distinguished Republican friend who has offered this amendment, to certain historical considerations in relation to the civil-service law. It is a most remarkable spectacle after the history of the law. It is a most remarkable spectacle, after the history of the civil service of the United States has to some extent been reviewed here this afternoon, that such an amendment should be introduced into this body. For the purpose of directing the attention of all Republican members to the subject in a more distinct manner than I have hitherto done, I desire now to read from the Republican platform as adopted on the 16th of June, 1896. I want it to be fresh in the minds of members. I read:

The civil-service law was placed on the statute book by the Republican party, which has always sustained it, and we renew our repeated declarations that it shall be thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable.

And our standard bearer said in his letter of acceptance:

The pledge of the Republican national convention that our civil-service laws shall be sustained and "thoroughly and honestly enforced and extended wherever practicable," is in keeping with the position of the party for the past twenty-four years, and will be faithfully observed. * * The Republican party will take no backward step upon the question. It will seek to improve, but never degrade the public service.

Upon another occasion the same distinguished standard bearer of the Republican party, who will have control of the civil service of this country after the 4th of March next, declared that the civil-service law was a Republican measure. It was in this House in 1890 that he made this declaration, when the annual attempt was made to cripple the civil service by cutting down the appropriation to carry it into effect:

It is a Republican measure, and is in accord with the highest and best sentiments of the country, and no party will have the courage to wipe it from the statute book or to amend it, save in the direction of its improvement. The Republican party must take no step backward. The merit system is here and it is here to stay, and we may just as well understand and accept it now and give our attention to correcting the abuses, if any exist, and improving the law wherever it can be done to the advantage of the public service.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to say, in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that I am thoroughly familiar with the declaration contained in the Republican platform on this subject, and my offering an amendment to strike out the appropriation in this bill does not so much indicate hostility on my part to the merit system as my opposition to the extension of the civil-service law, making it embrace the number of offices it has been made to embrace by recent Executive orders. There seems to be in this House opposition to that line of policy; and I believe that this amendment, striking out the appropriation, should be adopted by this committee.

Mr. BROSIUS. Does not the gentleman know that his amendment strikes down the civil-service law altogether?

Mr. SETTLE. Oh, no; if the amendment be adopted, we shall simply fail to make the appropriation under this provision of the bill. I agree that this would cripple the law a great deal, and I wish I could cripple it a great deal more. [Laughter and applause.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that when the gentleman from Pennsylvania quoted from an ex-Chief Magistrate of this country his opinion in respect to the efficiency of the civil service, he meant to answer the question which I propounded when I had the floor a short time ago; that is, whether the incoming President will make the radical changes that a former Republican President made wen he came into office in March, 1889?

Mr. BROSIUS. Mr. Chairman, have I permission to answer the gentleman?

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman has my permission. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will pro-

Mr. BROSIUS. I apprehend, indeed I feel quite sure, that the Executive-elect, when he comes to treat the question of the civil service, will do all he can to improve its effectiveness. Whether he will change the order that has been promulgated by the present Executive I have no means of knowing. But I know enough of the man to believe that he will pursue a conservative and cautious course in that respect, with the view he has himself so repeatedly declared, not only in his letter of acceptance but in his speeches on this floor, that the civil service of the United States is here; it is here to stay; and all we desire to do is to improve it all we can and make it as efficient as possible.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Would it be inconsistent with the former course of the Chief Executive-elect if he should make the radical change which President Harrison made in 1889?

Mr. BROSIUS. Does not my friend know that a great man, a statesman, a philosopher, has nothing to do with consistency? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, I have heretofore sent to the Clerk's desk an amendment looking to the perfection of the text of the bill. I ask that the amendment be

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from New Hampshire.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 24, line 19, after the word "dollars," add as a new paragraph the fol-

Page 24, line 19, after the word donars, and as a new passage lewing:

"The head of each of the several Executive Departments, at his discretion, may reinstate or reappoint to any subordinate position which from any cause may become vacant in his Department any person now or formerly employed in the civil service of the Government who, in his opinion, was reduced in salary or was discharged from the service for causes not affecting his or her efficiency or moral character, and such prior service for that purpose shall be held to be equivalent to a civil-service certificate of eligibility, anything in any statute, rule, or regulation to the contrary notwithstanding."

Mr. McMILLIN. There is a point of order pending against that amendment, I understand.

Mr. BINGHAM. I make a point of order against the amend-

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was under the impression that this was an amendment to the paragraph now under considera-tion. But, as a matter of fact, it applies to the following para-graph, and is not in order at this time. The present question is upon the motion to strike out, made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Settle].

The question being taken, there were on a division (called for by Mr. Settle)—ayes 29, noes 62.
So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For necessary traveling expenses, including those of examiners acting under the direction of the Commission, and for expenses of examinations and investigations held elsewhere than at Washington, $7,000.

Mr. SETTLE. I move to strike out that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Settle] moves to strike out the paragraph just read. An amendment, however, to this paragraph is pending and will take precedence—the amendment of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Baker], which has just been read. Against this amendment the point of order is raised that it changes existing law. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to be heard on his point of order?

Mr. BINGHAM. I submit that the concluding language of the gentleman's proposition, "anything in any statute, rule, or regulation to the contrary notwithstanding," assumes or presupposes that the amendment is contrary to existing statute. I will, however, refer the Chair to the civil-service act, the first two divisions ever, refer the Chair to the civil-service act, the first two divisions under section 2. I also refer the Chair to the regulations adopted under that act—the first paragraph of section 2, and also Rule IX. The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has examined the citations made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and is clearly of the opinion that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit an amendment, which is not a step backward, but a step forward.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Amend by adding at end of line 19, page 24:

"And such further sum, from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, as may be necessary to defray the expense of conducting civil-service examinations of all persons now in the classified list who have never taken such examinations; and the Civil Service Commission is hereby directed to hold such examinations and to certify for vacancies that may be due to failures to pass such examinations from the eligible lists, as in the cases of appointments made subsequent to the extension of the service."

Mr. BINGHAM. I make the point of order against the amendment; it is an indefinite appropriation, and it changes existing

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Connecticut, if he desires to be heard, on the point of order.

Mr. HILL. I did not care to discuss the question of order. I simply wanted to discuss the propriety of 40,000 employees being desired without civil-service examination. admitted without civil-service examination.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule, and sustains the point of order.

The question now recurs on the motion made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Settle] to strike out the paragraph.

from North Carolina [Mr. SETTLE] to strike out the paragraph.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask now, in order that the text of the bill may be corrected as to the sum total, to make a change in one of the paragraphs. The committee have changed the compensation of the Librarian from $6,000 to $5,000. The sum total, as pertaining to appropriations for the Library, is $93,020. It should read now, owing to the change to which I have referred, $92,020, which makes the bill consistent. I ask that the correction be made correction be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the correction will be made as indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Hepburn reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and as so amended that the bill do pass.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move the previous question upon the bill and amendments.

The previous question was ordered, under the operation of which the amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BINGHAM, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn. Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask the gentleman to withhold the motion for a moment until I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I shall not object, if it does not lead to debate.

CIVIL SERVICE STATISTICS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I submit, Mr. Speaker, for present consideration a concurrent resolution, which I send to the desk. The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 1,500 copies of the compilation of the statistics showing the exact state of the classified and unclassified parts of the executive civil service of the United States, so arranged as to include positions by Departments, offices, and commissions, with subdivisions by grades, the compilation containing a complete list of all positions, whether classified by compensation, whether appointed by the President solely or by confirmation by the Senate, whether the positions are in the classified service and excepted from examination, whether they are in the unclassified service by reason of their exclusion, whether they are mere laborers and unclassified, or whether they are positions classifiable but not yet classified, be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives and 500 copies for the use of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. BRUMM. I object. Mr. RICHARDSON. This is a privileged matter.

Mr. BROSIUS. I would like to say a word in regard to this question.

It is a privileged matter. I am told by the Civil Service Commission that they have received 150 letters from members of Congress inquiring for the information which the report embraces, and which the report, having been already compiled, will fully

I think it is something that would be very valuable to members of the House, and I do not know any other mode of making it available but the method now proposed.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why not include the proportion of the several States in this report?

Mr. BROSIUS. It does not include the apportionment by States,

I will say to the gentleman. That, I suppose, will be embodied in the report of the Civil Service Commissioners, which is now about ready. This report has involved a great deal of labor and care ready. This report has involved and will be a valuable document.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do you give that proportion in the statistics you have furnished in your speech to-day?

Mr. HOAR. I present the memorial of Charles Francis Adams, president, and 10 other gentlemen, members of the council of the Massachusetts Historical Society, remonstrating against the destruction of the United States frigate Constitution, and praying that adequate provision be immediately made for renewing that ship and hereafter preserving her; and that when renewed she may be placed at the Washington Navy-Yard, and thereafter kept in complete repair and used as a naval museum.

This petition is very brief, about as brief as I could state it if I undertook to make a compact statement of its contents under the rule. I respectfully ask that the petition be read in full.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petition will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States;

Your memorialists, representing the Massachusetts Historical Society, and acting under instructions from it, would represent that it has come to the knowledge of the society that the U.S. frigate Constitution, now lying at the navy-yard in Kittery, Mo., has, through age and lack of adequate renewal, reached a condition when she must be either practically rebuilt or broken up, as the alternative to sinking at her moorings.

The oldest society of the kind in America, the Massachusetts Historical Society, and the frigate Constitution are almost coeval; for, while this society was still young in years, the Constitution was launched from the ways of a wharf in Boston still named "Constitution Wharf" in grateful memory of the event: and when, in 1829, her destruction was ordered, it was the spirited lyric of Oliver Wendell Holmes, subsequently for many years a prominent member of the society, which led to the revocation of the order and the preservation of the historic ship. The Massachusetts Historical Society thus feels a peculiar and almost personal interest in and reverence for the frigate Constitution.

Your memorialists would further represent that an historical interest ervation of the historic ship. The Massachusetts Historical Society thus feels a peculiar and almost personal interest in and reverence for the frigate Constitution.

Your memorialists would further represent that an historical interest attaches to the Constitution which attaches to no other ship in the maritime annals of the English-speaking race in America; for it has been truly asserted by an American historian that it was the broadsides of the Constitution which, on the 29th day of Angust. 1812, in the conflict with the British frigate Guerrière, in the space of one short half hour, elevated the United States into the rank of a first-class power. The Constitution is also in the popular mind of the country associated with feats of devotion and daring than which none in our naval history are more skillful, more glorious, or more worthy of commemoration. Her name is synonymous with seamanship, courage, and unbroken triumph. In the view of your memorialists, therefore, as in the view of a large portion of the citizens of the United States, and especially of New England, the same interest should attach to the Constitution which in Great Britain attaches to the equally old, though hardly more famous, line-of-battle ship Victory, which bore the flag of Nelson at Trafalgar.

Under these circumstances your memorialists would pray that adequate provision be immediately made for renewing the Constitution and for hereafter preserving her, representing, as she ever will, a form of naval architecture now extinct, and associated, as she is and ever must be, with many of the most cherished recollections of the American people. The Victory is carefully perpetuated by Great Britain as an historical relic of unsurpassed value and abiding interest, and the American people regard the Constitution as to them in no way less precious.

Under the instructions of the society they represent, your memorialists, constituting the council of that society, would therefore respectfully pray that the Constitution, when renewed, may be perma

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That 1,500 copies of the compilation of the statistics showing the exact state of the classified and unclassified parts of the executive civil service of the United States, so arranged as to include positions by Departments, offices, and commissions, with subdivisions by grades, the compilation containing a complete list of all, positions, whether classified by compensation, whether appointed by the President solely or by confirmation by the Senate, whether the positions are in the classified service and excepted from examination, whether they are in the unclassified service by reason of their exclusion, whether they are mere laborers and unclassified, or whether they are positions classifiable but not yet classified, be printed, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the House of Representatives and 500 copies for the use of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Instead of the resolution being referred to the Committee on Printing, I ask that it be put upon its passage. The document contains information for which every Senator and Representative is being applied to by constituents, and the sooner the resolution is passed the better.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 8053) granting a pension to Alice Gard, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 8850) to amend an act passed at the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress entitled "An act to grant to railroad companies in Indian Territory additional power to secure depot grounds, and to correct alignments," was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 9643) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

NATIONAL MONETARY COMMISSION.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, in accordance with the notice I gave some time ago. I ask that the joint resolution (S. R. 169) providing for the appointment of a national monetary commission may be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business having been concluded, the Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution indicated by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask that the joint resolution may be read at

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, the object which it is sought by this joint resolution to accomplish is not only desirable—it is imperatively necessary in the public interest.

PRESENT FINANCIAL SYSTEM UNSATISFACTORY

Our financial system is not good; it is not satisfactory to any class of the people, nor to any political party. Nor are the objections and criticisms of recent origin. They appeared soon after the disbandment of the Army, when the Government began a rapid conversion of our paper currency into 6 per cent bonds. The protest was strong enough and general enough to bring into life a new political party which maintained a national organiza-tion sixteen years and four times contended for the Presidency of the Republic.

the Republic.

The revision of our mint laws in 1873, whereby the coinage of silver dollars was discontinued, aroused an opposition which has continued to the present. The opposition first took form in resolutions introduced in the Senate by Hon. Stanley Matthews, then a member of this body, January, 1878. The Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Sherman) in April, 1877, had asked the opinion of the Attorney-General whether resumption bonds could not legally be made payable in gold. On receiving a negative answer, the Secretary in his first annual report, recommended to Congress that retary, in his first annual report, recommended to Congress that such bonds be authorized. To set the matter at rest, the Matthews resolutions were offered.

I submit the correspondence and the resolutions without read-

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, Washington, D. C., April 21, 1877.

Washington, D. C., April 21, 1877.

Sir: I beg leave to call your attention to, and ask your opinion upon, the following questions growing out of the refunding act of July 14, 1876, to wit: Can I stipulate in the body of the 4 per cent bonds about to be issued that they shall be redeemable in coin of the present standard value, that is, the standard value at the date of their issue, or must it be the date of the law? I submit a statement prepared by the Hon. H. M. French, Assistant Secretary, having reference to the laws.

It may become important to the public interests to make the new bonds payable in coin of the present standard—that is, gold coin. Some doubts have been expressed upon whether previous bonds issued under acts passed prior to 1873 are not legally payable in silver coin. This question may become important, as any doubt upon the legal terms of a public security affects its value.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN, Secretary.

Hon. CHARLES DEVENS, Attorney-General.

In answer, the Attorney-General wrote this letter:

In answer, the Attorney-General wrote this letter:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, April 26, 1877.

Sir: In answer to your letter of the 21st instant, requesting my opinion upon the following question growing out of the refunding act of July 14, 1870, to wit, "Can I stipulate in the body of the 4 per cent bonds about to be issued that they shall be redeemable in coin of the present value, that is, the standard value at the date of their issue, or must it be the date of the law?" I have the honor to reply:

The act provides for the issue of bonds "redeemable in coin of the present standard value." The word "present" undoubtedly refers as a matter of date to the time when the act was passed, and not to the time when the bonds were thereafter issued. It contemplated that a long period would elapse before it would finally be carried into effect, and that changes in the coinage of the country might occur during that period.

Whatever changes in the coinage should occur, these bonds were, however, to be redeemed in coin of the standard value as it existed at the date of the act. By this provision the holder was guarded against any depreciation that might take place in the value of the coin, and the Government would not be compelled to pay the additional value should the coinage be appreciated. All the bonds issued under the act were to stand alike, no matter what was the date when such bonds were issued. Each was to be redeemable in coin which was included in the authorized coinage of the country at the date referred to, it being of the standard value as it then existed. Since the law was passed no change has taken place in the standard value of the coin. It is understood that there has been a certain change in the coinage of the country, and that silver dollars have now ceased to exist practically as coin.

It has been further provided by the statute of February 12, 1873 (Revised Statutes, sections 3855, 3886), that "the silver coins of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amo

THE MATTHEWS RESOLUTIONS.

Whereas by an act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had previously provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold or silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under an act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in the said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt;" and Whereas at the date of the passage of the said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,' "to be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sums whatever: Therefore, Beit resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein). That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States, containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

An effort was made by Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, to have the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

An effort was made by Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, to have the resolution modified in favor of gold payments when demanded by the creditor, but the amendment was voted down—yeas 18, nays 48—and the resolution passed the Senate by a large majority. It was at once sent to the House, where in like manner similar amendments were defeated, and the original resolution passed by 180 years to 79 pays. by 189 yeas to 79 nays.

An effort to restore the old coinage laws resulted in the passage of the Bland-Allison Act over the President's veto February 28, 1878, and the faint-hearted execution of that law prompted another movement for free coinage twelve years later, which ended in the approval of the Sherman law of July 14, 1890. In May, 1891, steps were taken for the formation of a political party having as one of its cardinal doctrines the reformation of our currency system. In 1892 the Populist or People's Party candidate for the Presidency received over a million votes.

The Sherman law occasioned so much trouble in speculating circles that an extraordinary session of Congress was convened August 7, 1893, for the express purpose of repealing it, and that brought the money question to the front as the leading issue in the campaign of 1896.

A commission composed of eminent statesmen and economists, A commission composed of eminent statesmen and economists, with Hon. John P. Jones, then and now a member of this body, at its head, was appointed in 1876 to investigate and report fully upon the subject of money. Several international conferences have been held since that time for the purpose of determining whether an agreement could not be reached among the nations to establish a common ratio of value between gold and silver in coincident of the purpose of the purp age, and it is now proposed to appoint a commission to bring about another conference to further consider the same subject.

In addition to these evidences of dissatisfaction with our financial methods, bills and resolutions in large number relating in some way to the currency have been before Congress at every some way to the currency have been before Congress at every session in the last thirty years, and the tension of the public mind is greater now than ever. Each and all of the great parties in the late campaign have given notice that they intend to continue the agitation of the money question until it is permanently settled and got out of the way.

For these reasons alone, Mr. President, if no others were as signed, this joint resolution is appropriate and ought to pass. Nothing which concerns our domestic affairs is more timely than some measure of this kind. If passed and its provisions carried into execution, the views of all classes and conditions of the people will be heard and their opinions will have equal prominence in a hearing before Congress. It would seem reasonable that there ought to be some common ground on which we can all meet, and the proposed commission would try to find it. But there are other reasons why the resolution ought to pass.

At no time in the history of the country has the supply of coin been sufficient for the convenient transaction of the people's business. The colonies were compelled frequently to issue paper money. Virginia once legalized the use of tobacco as money. The first loan negotiated by the Continental Congress was, by stipulation, paid in tobacco. The only coin we had when the Government of the United States was formed was foreign coin. Coins of Great Britain, France, Portugal, and Spain were then in circulation here. The Spanish milled dollar was made the measure of our unit of value in the first mint act. our unit of value in the first mint act.

In 1791 Congress authorized the establishment of a United States bank in order to secure more currency. The next year a mint was authorized, that more coin might be obtained; and, by way of encouragement to miners and to induce them to bring to the mint for coinage all the gold and silver they could procure, the law provided for the free and unlimited coinage of both metals. The next year (1793) foreign coins were made legal tender, but the demand for currency was greater than the supply, and it became necessary to charter State banks and to authorize them to issue their notes to be used as money. In 1816 the second United States bank was chartered, and it continued in business twenty years. In the meantime, local banks multiplied in all the States, issuing notes until they were superseded by the national banks provided for by the acts of 1863-64.

The demand for local banks of issue has been renewed since the great war closed. Farmers in the Southern States, being distressed by lack of money, proposed what is known as the sub-treasury plan, that they might use warehouse receipts for tem-porary circulation. And now, in addition to the large stock of coin reported to be in the country, the paper circulation amounted to $703,757,186 on the 1st day of December last, not including silver certificates, which represent an equal amount of silver dollars held in the Treasury for their redemption.

And yet, with a reported total circulation of coin and paper amounting to $1,646,444,746, it supplies but 8 per cent of the total money and substitutes for money used in our enormous bank busi-From several examinations made in recent years it appears ness. From several examinations made in recent years to appears that about 1 per cent of the money passed over bank counters in a given time is gold coin, about 1 per cent is silver coin, 6 per cent is Government paper and bank notes, and 92 per cent is made up of notes, checks, drafts, and other forms of private paper.

INJUSTICE OF THE PRESENT SYSTEM.

The present system operates unjustly. It bears heavily on the people. It puts money before labor. It makes savings more valuable than the ability to earn. It allows charges of 6 per cent to 150 per cent a year for the use of borrowed money, while labor saves only 3 per cent, and it measures allowable profits on business investments and speculative enterprises by the interest standard. It multiplies redemption money by ten and charges interest on the whole just as it permits railway companies and other corporations. whole, just as it permits railway companies and other corporations to bond themselves for more than they are worth and charge the people toll on the inflated capital. It makes investments in credit more valuable than investments in land or mines or machinery. It fixes the value standard of money by law, while all other property finds its price level in open market. It affords the lender all advantages and the borrower none. It saves the creditor, though the debtor be destroyed.

Mr. President, the value of money ought to be measured by the walue of the property out of whose proceeds debts and taxes must be paid and means of subsistence procured. As the general price level is, so should the price of money be, and this whether to borrow or to buy. But under the present régime the standard of money is as rigid as the yardstick or the gallon measure, while market prices for the productions of labor fluctuate on a falling scale like the killows restens for activities leke market prices for the productions of labor fluctuate on a falling scale like the billowy waters of a settling lake.

For example, take the single article of wheat. Its average price in 1867 was $1.98; in 1873 it was $1.15; in 1879 it was $1.10; in 1885 it was 77 cents; in 1890 it was 83 cents; in 1895 it was 50 cents. Correspondingly, a dollar in 1867 was worth a little more than one-half of a bushel of wheat; in 1873 it was worth seveneighths of a bushel; in 1879 it was worth nine-tenths of a bushel; in 1885 it was worth a bushel and nearly one-third; in 1890 it was worth a bushel and one-fifth; in 1895 it was worth 2 bushels.

To put the same idea in another light, let it be said that at the average price of wheat in 1867 it would have required 1,135,000,000 bushels of that grain to pay the nation's interest-bearing debt as

WORLD'S PRODUCTION OF WHEAT.

The world's production of wheat was not accurately reported by our Agricultural Department prior to 1891. Here is a table giv-ing the most reliable estimates for the years 1884 to 1890, and for the years since we have the official report:

Year.	Bushels.	Year.	Bushels.
1884	2,290,069,000	1890	2, 170, 123, 000
1885	2,104,034,003	1891	2, 482, 322, 000
1886	2,198,997,000	1892	2, 481, 805, 000
1887	2,227,415,000	1893	2, 562, 913, 000
1888	2,212,843,000	1893	2, 672, 341, 000
1889	2,085,505,000	1894	2, 552, 677, 000

While the prices of manufactured articles have fallen, the dewhile the prices of manufactured articles have fallen, the descent has not been as low as that of farm products; but that the general level of prices has been greatly depressed none deny. Mr. Sauerbeck's table of index numbers makes this perfectly clear. He took the average market price of forty-five different commodities in general use, and let the number 102 represent the average price for the year 1874, using that as an index number with which to compare the average price of the same articles in the subsequent years to 1892. The showing is this:

Year.	Index numbers for 45 principal commodi- ties.	Year.	Index numbers for 45 principal commodi- ties.
1874	102 96 95 94 87 83 88 85 84 82	1884 1885 1886 1887 1888 1889 1890 1891	76 72 69 68 70 72 72 72 72 68

These forty-five articles were made up of provisions, clothing, groceries, fuel, etc., such as are in general use and regarded as necessaries among the people in common.

FALLING PRICES, RISING MONEY.

As an inevitable concomitant of falling prices we have rising money. As prices of articles in general go down, the price of money in particular goes up. Thirty years ago a dollar bought only half a bushel of wheat; two years ago it bought 2 bushels—four times as much. By using the Sauerbeck table we can get more nearly accurate figures as to the general market. I submit a statement made from that table, showing how many units $100 would have purchased in each of the years mentioned, beginning in 1874 with a quantity represented by 98.05:

1874	93.05	1884	131.58
1875	104.16	1885	138.88
1876	105.26	1886	144.93
1877	106.39	1887	147.05
1878	114.93	1888	142.85
1879	120.48		138.88
1880	113.63	1890	138.88
1881	117.64	1891	138.88
1883	121.95

These figures show that if the number 98 is used to represent what $100 bought in 1874, it will require the number 147 to represent what the same money bought in 1892. In other words, money, measured by the necessaries of life, was worth 50 per cent more in 1892 than it was in 1874. I will add, it is worth 10 per cent more now than it was in 1892.

BURDEN OF DEBTS, TAXES, INTEREST, AND RENT INCREASED.

The rise in the purchasing power of money and the fall in the general level of prices have the effect of increasing the burden of debts, taxes, interest, and rent; and the reason of this oppression is that more of the products of labor to meet any given money demand is required now than formerly. A farmer has nothing to pay his debts with but the crops he raises, and it took 2 bushels of his 1895 wheat to get a dollar, while in 1867 it required only half a bushel—just one-fourth as much. Hence, if he had to pay a $100 debt with wheat, it would have taken four times as many bushels in 1895 as it did twenty-eight years before.

The aggregate mortgage debt on the farms of the country in 1890 was more than two thousand million dollars. I have not the 1890 was more than two thousand million dollars. I have not the exact figures at hand. But whatever the amount was it would have required about two and a half times as much wheat to pay it that year as would have been necessary to pay the same amount twenty-three years before.

And so it is with all debts; they grow more burdensome as long as prices of things with which they must be paid are going down. A dollar is a fixed amount, but relatively to other things down. A dollar is a fixed amount, but relatively to other things it grows dearer as they get cheaper.

Taxes, interest, and rent are affected the same way. They are fixed charges; they mean so many dollars, and they remain the same, while cotton and pork and shoes and productions in general are steadily falling. A hundred dollars regularly due every year is equivalent to adding three or four dollars at each payment. ment.

Rising money undermines the home; it multiplies renters; it

It will not answer to say that because prices in general have fallen, therefore the buyer and the seller are even, no matter how low the level is. If men had nothing to do but to buy and sell, the case would be altogether different. But it is a crime to kill people without just provocation. It is regarded as a heinous offense to kill one's self. We are all expected to live and to earn a living, to trade and accumulate property. It is often found to be necessary to incur debts, and they must be paid with interest. We need dwelling places, and if we do not own homes of our own, we must rent, and that costs money. We are taxed to support the Government, and taxes now mean money. Sickness or other misfortune befalls us, and physicians' charges, lawyers' fees—all such necessary expenses are on the same level that they were years ago; but money has not fallen. If the farmer and the mechanic needed nothing more than they could procure from each other, they could get along more than they could procure from each other, they could get along without trouble. But each of them is constantly in need of something the other does not have—as professional services, insurance, a dwelling, and money. The ratio of local taxation on the $100 of property is not increasing; it is about stationary, the country's average being $1.83 in 1880, and $1.85 in 1890; but a dollar in taxes grows larger in a time of falling prices the same as a dollar in any other form of obligation.

We pray for our daily bread, but the demands of society grow more exacting with the spread of Christian civilization. We need more than bread, and we can procure it only out of the proceeds of our surplus productions. Hence it is that we are much more interested in the price of what we sell than in that of what we buy. Our surplus must pay for all we need of other people's productions, and in addition to that we must have means to pay insurance, rent, taxes, interest, and principal debts. Low prices of things we have to buy avail us nothing when we come to debts that we have to pay out of the low prices received for what we sell.

WAGES GREATLY REDUCED.

Nor will it do to say that wages of labor are as high as they ever were. If it were true, it would not help matters; but it is not true, except as to those persons who are fortunate enough to have regular except as to those persons who are fortunate enough to have regular and permanent employment. A recent report of the Commissioner of Labor shows that over 3,000,000 persons of work age were out of employment part of the time during the last year, and that about one and a quarter million were out of employment all the time. If all the money that has been paid for labor during the last five years had been divided among all the people who were able and willing to work, including the unemployed, the general level of wages would have been greatly lowered. If a hundred dollars be divided among a hundred men each will have $1; but if one-quarter of the men are idle and three-quarters get the money, it means $1.33\frac{1}{2} a day to those that work. Taking out 10 per cent of the workers, it leaves $1.11 to each of them that work. If the average daily wage now is $1.25 for 90 per cent of the working people of the country, it would be $1.12½ if all the workers were employed and the aggregate amount of the wages were paid to all instead of to only 90 per cent. This would reduce wages 8 per cent.

And under the present conditions long continued labor will suffer most of all, for labor is nature's handmaid in the production of wealth, and ever and always the wage earner is the least able to bear society's burdens. The poor people are always found among those whose daily subsistence comes out of their daily toil. Deprive them of work, and their means of living is gone. Fair wages for one is not enough for two.

INFLUENCE OF THE MONEY POWER.

The influence which wealth exerts in the affairs of men is greater The influence which wealth exerts in the affairs of men is greater by far than any other force in Christendom. It directs the course of governments and dictates the policies of nations. It declares war and commands peace. It controls legislation and inspires judicial decisions. It is now permitted to exercise supreme power over the Treasury of the United States. It compels the President to sell the country's credit; it contracts to protect the Treasury six months against withdrawals of gold, and threatens to destroy the public credit unless circulating notes of the Government are retired and the currency put in charge of the banks.

It suggests party platforms; it supplies money for campaign funds, and demands reward in legislative favors. "It moves the money that controls the affairs of the world." It covers the earth with debt and holds the people slaves.

While I speak, sir, the people of the United States are paying semiannual interest on an aggregate debt equal to the assessed value of all their taxable property, and our national taxes are increasing every decade, while the ability of the masses to pay is steadily diminishing.

Recently I read a statement prepared by a newspaper writer in London giving the amounts which each of fifty-six different nations—naming them—owed to bankers and brokers in that city. I do not remember the figures, but the aggregate was enormous. These debts, like all others, must be paid out of the earnings of the people, and failure to pay, as we all know, is cause

An investigation made during the first Administration of President Cleveland brought out the astounding fact that, taking the civilized world as a whole, one-half of the occupied lands of the people were mortgaged. It is not putting it too strongly to say that 90 per cent of the corporations are in debt. Indeed, the leadanat 50 per cent of the corporations are in debt. Indeed, the leading object of modern industrial capitalization appears to be the building of interest fountains. The annual interest charge on American railway bonds is not less than $350,000,000, and other corporations are bonded in like manner. The farm and home mortgage debt of the country in 1890 was a little over $6,000,000,000, and this, at only 6 per cent, produces $360,000,000 annually.

For the purposes of argument it may be said, in a general way, that nearly everybody is in debt. There are exceptions, but it will not be claimed that more than 20 per cent of the people are free from debt. Fifty-two per cent of our families are renters, and they are all in debt and under bonds. The average proportion of renters in cities of 8,000 inhabitants and upward is 500 per cent of the entire population; and in the large cities—of 100,000 population and more—the average is 77 in the 100 families. In New York City, renting families constitute 94 per cent of the whole number of families residing there. Every renter is bonded to his landlord.

The aggregate indebtedness of the people is great beyond comprehension, and that it is increasing must be apparent to every reading person. And when the individual debts are added to the corporate, municipal, and national obligations the grand total is bewildering, even to the mathematician. These large debts are bewildering, even to the mathematician. These large debts are likewise growing in amount. The Pall Mall Gazette, in an article recently published in that journal and copied in the Scientific American, discusses this subject, showing the steady enlargement of the aggregate debt of the world's nations. The comparison is of the aggregate debt of the world's nations. The comparison is made between the years 1875 and 1895. England, Germany, Spain, and the United States have reduced their national debts, but the rest have increased theirs to such an extent that fourteen of the principal nations show an aggregate increase of about $4,200,-000,000 in the twenty years. The aggregate of the national debts of the world in 1875 is put at £4,750,000,000—equivalent to $22,285,-000,000. It had grown to £5,800,000,000 on $29,188,000,000,000 in one 000,000. It had grown to £5.800,000,000, or $28,188,000,000 in our money, in 1895. And these are only the public debts; they do not include corporate and individual obligations. The annual interest charge on this enormous burden is estimated at £230,000,000, or $1,117,800,000.

I submit the article without reading, and ask that it may be printed with my remarks as an appendix. It is not very long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Pasco in the chair). The article will be printed as an appendix, in the absence of objection.

HOW THE MONEY POWER ACQUIRED ITS STRENGTH. Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, they that own a country's debts are the rulers of its people. The money power has acquired its mastery over the people through the ownership of their securities. Let demand be made to-morrow on the nation, the States, the banks, the railroads and other corporations, the manufacturers, the merchants, and the farmers for what they owe, and the country is the manufacturers and the farmers for what they owe, and the country is the merchants, and the farmers for what they owe, and the country is the manufacturers. try would be bankrupt. In less than two years the Government borrowed nearly $300,000,000 to redeem notes because the public creditors refused to accept anything but gold, though the notes were payable in silver.

To prosecute a great war Congress authorized the issue and circulation of large amounts of paper that might be used as currency among the people. Some of these notes were convertible into bonds, and they were depreciated in order to create a market for the bonds. The public debt July 1, 1866, was $2,773,236,173, and of this amount $1,900,000,000, in round figures, was in notes of different classes and issued at different times, some of which bore interest. July 1, 1869, the interest-bearing debt was $2,162,060,522 in bonds. These bonds had cost their owners about 60 cents on the dollar. The value of the bonds was greatly enhanced by the credit-strengthening act of 1869, the refunding act of 1870, and the mint act of 1873, so that bonds which had not cost more than 60 cents on the dollar rose to a premium of 25 to 30 per cent in the eighties. The Government paid out upward of $60,000,000 in premiums on the bonds it redeemed between 1880 and 1892.

In addition to the rise in value of bonds by reason of the enactment of these laws, the value or the purchasing power of a dollar has been greatly enhanced by the arbitrary action of the Treasury Department in discrediting our silver coin. Every bond now out is redeemable in coin of the standard value of July 14, 1870. It is so written in the bond. I present a copy of one of the one-thousand-dollar bonds issued in 1877.

It will be seen that in both cases the bonds are expressly "redeemable in coin of the standard value of the United States on the 14th day of July, 1870"—the date of the approval of the refunding act. Our coin at that time consisted of gold and silver—gold at 25.8 grains to the dollar, and silver at 412.5 grains to the dollar. And such was our coin when the credit-strengthening act of March 18, 1869, was approved. Yet the Treasury Department persists in paying only gold for interest on the bonded debt and in redemption of Government notes.

The effect of this discrimination in favor of gold coin is to prac-The effect of this discrimination in favor of gold coin is to practically demonetize silver and to add largely to the value of gold, thus strengthening the power of the money interest and adding to the burdens of the masses of the people. The thirst for gold seems to be as great, sir, in the closing years of the nineteenth century, as was the demand for silver among the grasping Greeks and Romans, when slaves alone wrought in the mines; for now, as then, the profits of toil are absorbed by the wealthy few.

ABOUT THE REMEDIES PROPOSED.

This much, Mr. President, concerning the condition of the finances of the country. And now something about proposed remedies. The resolution refers to the different views of the political parties in the late Presidential campaign. For convenience of reference I present the money planks of four of the party platforms, beginning with that of the Republican party. I ask that the Secretary be permitted to read those planks in the platforms as I have marked them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the Secretary

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Republican party is unreservedly for sound money. It caused the enactment of the law providing for the resumption of specie payments in 1879; since then every dollar has been as good as gold.

We are unalterably opposed to every measure calculated to debase our currency or impair the credit of our country. We are, therefore, opposed to the free coinage of silver, except by international agreement with the leading commercial nations of the world, which we pledge ourselves to promote, and until such agreement can be obtained, the existing gold standard must be preserved.

All our silver and paper currency must be maintained at parity with gold, and we favor all measures designed to maintain inviolably the obligations of the United States and all our money, whether coin or paper, at the present standard, the standard of the most enlightened nations of the earth.

[From the platform adopted by the Democratic party in Chicago, July 9, 1896.] We demand the free and unlimited coinage of both silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting for the aid or consent of any other nation. We demand that the standard silver dollar shall be a full legal tender, equally with gold, for all debts, public and private, and we favor such legislation as will prevent for the future the demonetization of any kind of legal-tender money by private contract.

We are opposed to the policy and practice of surrendering to the holders of the obligations of the United States the option reserved by law to the Government of redeeming such obligations in either silver coin or gold coin.

Congress alone has the power to coin and issue money, and President Jackson declared that this power could not be delegated to corporations or individuals. We, therefore, denounce the issuance of notes intended to circulate as money by national banks as in derogation of the Constitution, and we demand that all paper which is made a legal tender for public and private debts, or which is receivable for duties to the United States, shall be issued by the Government of the United States, and shall be redeemable in coin.

The experience of mankind has shown that by reason of their natural qualities gold is the necessary namey of the large affairs of commerce and business, while silver is conveniently adapted to minor transactions, and the most beneficial use of both together can be insured only by the adoption of the former as a standard of monetary measure and the maintenance of silver at a parity with gold by its limited coinage under suitable safeguards of law.

Realizing these truths, demonstrated by long public incovenience and loss, the Democratic party, in the interests of the masses and of equal justice to all, practically established by the legislation of 1834 and 1853 the gold standard of monetary measurements, and likewise entirely divorced the Government from banking and currency issues. To this long-established Democratic policy we adhere, and insist upon the maintenance of the gold standard and of the parity therewith of every dollar issued by the Government and are firmly opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of silver and to the compulsory purchase of silver bullion.

But we denounce, also, the further maintenance of the present costly patchwork system of national paper currency as a constant source of injury and peril.

work system of haddonal paper currency as a constant source of injury and peril.

We assert the necessity of such intelligent currency reform as will confine the Government to its legitimate functions, completely separated from the banking business, and afford to all sections of our country a uniform, safe, and elastic bank currency under Government supervision, measured in volume by the needs of business.

[From the People's Party platform adopted at St. Louis July 24, 1896.]

1. We demand a national money, safe and sound, issued by the General Government only, without the intervention of banks of issue, to be a full legal tender for all debts, public and private; a just, equitable, and efficient means of distribution direct to the people and through the lawful disbursements of the Government.

2. We demand the free and unrestricted coinage of silver and gold at the present legal ratio of 16 to 1, without waiting for the consent of foreign present legal ratio of 16 to 1, without waters and productions.

3. We demand the volume of circulating medium be speedily increased to an amount sufficient to meet the demands of the business and population of this country, and to restore the just level of prices of labor and production.

5. We demand such legislation as will prevent the demonetization of the lawful money of the United States by private contract.
6. We demand that the Government in payment of its obligations shall use its option as to the kind of lawful money in which they are to be paid, and we denounce the present and preceding Administrations for surrendering this option to the holders of Government obligations.

Mr. PEFFER. It will be observed that there are three general propositions on which all of the parties are agreed, and they are

First. That gold coin ought to be used in our currency Second. That silver coin ought to be used in our currency.
Third. That paper money ought to be used in our currency.
But, while there is agreement on these as general propositions, there is difference of opinion with respect to details. All favor there is difference of opinion with respect to details. All favor unlimited coinage of gold, but only one demands that gold shall be and remain the sole permanent standard of money. Two of them demand unlimited coinage of silver at the present legal ratio, two favor a limited coinage of that metal, and one of these two wants the ratio determined by international agreement.

The Republican party is satisfied with the present system of paper currency; at all events, no dissatisfaction with it is expressed in the party platform. All the party seems to demand on this head is that every dollar shall be as good as gold.

pressed in the party platform. All the party seems to this head is that every dollar shall be as good as gold.

The National Democratic party denounces what it denominates-The present costly patchwork system of national paper currency-

And demands a-uniform, safe, and elastic bank currency under Government supervision, measured in volume by the needs of business.

The Democratic party and the People's or Populist party demand a paper currency issued only by the Government, but they differ in two important particulars. The Democratic party opposes national-bank notes, but it does not demand that they shall be superseded by Government paper. What it says on that point is this:

And we demand that all paper which is made a legal tender for public and private debts, or which is receivable for duties to the United States, shall be issued by the Government of the United States.

The Populists demand-

A national money, issued by the General Government only, without the intervention of banks.

The other point of difference is that the Democratic party insists that the paper money which is made legal tender shall be redeemable in coin, while the People's Party does not.

The object aimed at by the pending joint resolution is, if it be practicable, the bringing about of a substantial agreement upon these matters in dispute. And this ought not to be impossible. There is no material difference between the Republican contention and that of the National Democrats. It is altogether reasontion and that of the National Democrats. It is altogether reasonable to expect that when the Republicans have brought about an international agreement it will be promptly ratified by the National Democrats, if, indeed, they are not absorbed by the Republicans before the agreement is published.

And further, if the late advance made by the Democrats in their platform was made only for the purposes of a temporary alliance with other parties, and not to move itself permanently on a higher plane of politics, there would be little to displace in order to obtain plane of pointes, there would be little to displace in order to obtain their acquiescence in the Republican theory. A bill (S. 2642, third session Fifty-third Congress) introduced by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Jones] as a Democratic measure was entitled "A bill providing for the issue of bonds, the coinage of silver, and for other purposes," and after providing for the issue of bonds for the redemption of greenbacks, and the strengthening and continuation of national banks, it provided in the ninth section as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to receive at any United States mint, from any citizen of the United States, silver bullion of standard fineness, and coin the same into silver dollars of 412‡ grains each. The seigniorage on the said bullion shall be the difference between the coinage value thereof and the price of the bullion in London on the day the deposit is made.

Unless the Democrats have moved beyond the doctrine of that bill with the firm determination to never return, it would not require a long exercise of the diplomatic art to bring together require a long exercise of the diplomatic art to bring together three of the parties on the silver question; and even the People's Party might be brought to yield something on silver if other parties would yield something on the subject of legal-tender Government paper money. But that would undermine the metallic currency theory and terminate the rule of the money changers, And there, sir, is where the trouble lies. The Populist wants money that needs no redemption. Even the new Democrat wants legal-tender money redeemed in coin. In that respect, at least, he is in accord theoretically with the present Secretary of the Treasury, who has given notice that silver dollars will be redeemed with gold coin whenever that course is necessary to preserve the parity between the two metals.

Mr. President, the discussion, when narrowed down to the real issue, will turn on this theory of redemption, and I will now address myself to that point.

I believe our monetary system is fundamentally wrong—false in theory and ruinous in practice. The device we use to represent values is not only made out of a valuable commodity, but it has a values is not only made out of a valuable commonly, but it has a fictitious and arbitrary value given to it by law, and then it is allowed free and unlimited mintage, so that all the gold outside of the mines may be brought to the level of the mint price by getting it coined, and that can be done without expense to the owner. By our laws we declare that the eagle, containing 258 grains of standard gold, is and shall be of the value of $10; and by the same laws we provide-

That any owner of gold bullion may deposit the same at any mint, to be formed into coin or bars for his benefit—hereafter no charge shall be made for that service.

And this falsely and arbitrarily valued metal is not only made full legal tender for all debts and to any amount, but it is pro-tected by the laws of the land against the competition of any other kind of currency in all cases where a contract stipulates that an obligation to pay money can be discharged only by the delivery of gold coin. This puts borrowers at the mercy of lenders and sets up a golden king. In plain words, the laws of the Republic select a single article, give it a fixed and unchangeable value, and require that all debts, dues, and demands shall be paid in that article at its legal value. If we are permitted to use any substitutes for gold, they must be redeemable in gold. And when danger approaches, or when bankers and speculators take on fright, what little gold there is is immediately put out of sight, and panic with its disasters

The true theory of money is that it discharges a function—a public function—a function imposed upon it by law, just as ministerial functions are imposed by law on executive officers. A piece of plain silver or gold bullion can no more perform money functions than a plain citizen can perform official functions. The value of money is imparted by law. The price of gold or silver or other metal on which certain devices are imprinted to make it what we call coin, has value in itself as a commodity; but its value as money is what the laws prescribe—that and only that.

This proposition is easily and plainly demonstrated by means of two coins of the same metal and denomination, one of which has had the money function withdrawn from it by melting.

For the purpose of demonstrating the proposition, I procured a few days ago two silver dollar coins and had one of them melted few days ago two silver dollar coins and had one of them melted in order to take the money function away from it. This is the American dollar [exhibiting.] Its legal functions attach to it by the law. This is the other dollar melted [exhibiting]. It is not a dollar now, though it is as fine and as heavy as it was before melting. It is simply a bar of silver bullion. The coin having the commission of a mighty people upon it is worth a dollar in all the markets of the country, while the bar is worth nothing as money. I might go into any merchant's room and lay down this coin and ask for the worth of it in anything that he has to sell and he immediately would give me a dollar's worth. I lay the bar of bullion down and ask him to give me the worth of that in any article he has to sell and he laughs at my credulity and tells me, "Why, that is not money; that is only a bit of metal."

Mr. President, the simple question put to any sane man why one of these pieces is money and the other one is not will settle the matter in his own mind in favor of the proposition which I have just asserted. All there is in coin that gives it money value is what the law itself has imparted to it, and the lawmaking power

The functions of money are to enable persons to procure property or service; to effect exchanges of the values of their productions; to discharge their pecuniary obligations in cases of nonperformance of contract; to pay their debts and taxes, and to meet the demands of society upon them for aid and support in matters deemed necessary or important and provided for only by the unwritten laws of communities.

Money is representative in its character; it is charged with duties of supreme moment; it is the most subtle of all material agencies in the development of commerce and in social and religious progress. It has no value except what is imparted to it by the sovereign power of the nation, and that value consists chiefly in the fact that the coin is charged with these peculiar represent-ative qualities. It is an order for its face value on any person who has anything to sell; it is a tender of payment to the amount who has anything to sell; it is a tender of payment to the amount printed on its face, and it is a receipt for like amount. If the thing we call money were not thus endowed with purchasing and debt-paying power, it would be utterly worthless beyond what it would sell for as bullion or paper on the market. A man can carry in his vest pocket money enough to purchase his family supplies for a year at a department store, while if he were compelled to exchange for it property that is not money it might require a team of six horses to haul the stuff to town, and then it would have to be sold to a merchant or trader who deals in that kind of property in order to procure money to pay for the things desired.

When metal is coined and declared by law to be a lawful tender . in payment of debt to the amount stamped on its face, it is thus set apart—sanctified, if you please—for certain uses. This coining and printing is a certificate of authority, just as an officer's commission certifies to his official character; and he who repudiates the one does no better than he who defies the other.

Money is a tool of trade, a necessary instrument of commerceindispensable in the economy of modern civilization; and now that we find our present financial methods to be faulty as well as inadequate we ought to devise a better and more satisfactory system.

We are quite competent to do this, if we will only lay aside our prejudices and honestly work together to find a solid foundation that we may build upon it a suitable and comely superstructure, durable as it shall be symmetrical.

We are an inventive people, and invention applies as well to statecraft as to mechanic arts. Principles are eternal in politics as in the realm of matter. Good government follows a wise application of sound theories in legislation and of wisdom and prudence in execution of the laws.

We have learned that commerce is the greatest factor in civilization, and that money is as necessary in commercial affairs as blood is in the lives of men. And we have learned, too, that an insufficiency of money, or a plethora, or a congestion, or an irregular circulation, or money of inferior quality, is as troublesome in the business affairs of the people as are like conditions of blood in

I believe, sir, that we are not only competent to solve this seemingly difficult problem of money, but that we have already discovered the essential factors in the solution. I have read with much interest that part of the last report of the Comptroller of the Currency in which that officer calls attention to the large use of private credit in the transaction of daily business.

The check-

He savs-

and not the note, is the symbol of banking progress, and in its extensive use is the best proof of a high plane of industrial and commercial life.

That officer regards this feature of modern finance as of great importance. He says:

The check system is therefore a subject of interest and importance in our business world—of so much interest and so much importance that knowledge of the extent and influence of it is necessary to a proper understanding of the machinery of exchange.

And there, sir, lies the secret. Credit is the life of modern trade; and whose credit is equal to that of the Government? Our nation's credit was sufficient to carry on to a successful conclusion the most gigantic war in history. During those four dreadful years over $44,000,000 of business was done by the Treasury Department of the United States—virtually all of it done with paper money, and not a dollar lost to any citizen on account thereof. Money is credit coined, Mr. President. Let us, then, coin the public credit, and let the people have its use at a charge by way of Interest that they can afford to pay, and the problem is solved.

As to the machinery necessary to carry out this plan, that is matter of detail for the work of such a commission as is proposed in this resolution. I would suggest in a general way—

First. Provide for the coinage of gold and silver enough at the standard value of July 14, 1870 (and that is the present standard), to pay interest on the Government bonds outstanding and to redeem the bonds at maturity. All the bonds now out are redeem able in such coin. Revive the act of January 18, 1837, so far as it provides for the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold.

provides for the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold.

Second. Establish a system of public banking on capital secured by standard coin or bullion, or by United States bonds and par bonds of States, or by unencumbered real estate. Government paper only should be issued. Let interest rates be not to exceed 6 per cent per annum on short-time paper, and 2 or 3 per cent on long-time loans. Savings depositories should be connected with the banks, and deposits, whether of savings or of business funds, should be made secure against loss. To provide for flexibility in the currency, a legal-tender interest-bearing note might be issued to savings depositors. These could be used either as currency or as bonds, as the 7 30 notes were used thirty years ago and more.

This general plan, in a modified form, is presented somewhat in detail in the bill I introduced this morning, a copy of which I ask leave to insert with my remarks as an appendix, and without

While the change proposed would be radical, it need not be so sudden as to derange business or occasion general loss. The way from the treadmill to the electric motor is marked by individual misfortunes; but such is the experience of men. The way of progress is nature's way. Change comes from improvement. The old passes away as the new appears. And so, in changing our financial methods by improving them, the men whose business it is to deal in money will have to be satisfied with less profits and less power and influence than they now enjoy; but this will be many times compensated in the common good flowing to the people through a revived commerce and enlivened trade.

We must have a change in our financial methods. All parties sudden as to derange business or occasion general loss.

We must have a change in our financial methods. We must have a change in our manicial methods. All parties and all men of intelligence concede this. And coin is utterly inadequate, even if it were not objectionable on other grounds. We have outgrown the metallic system, just as the weaver has dispensed with the hand loom. Metal money is unjust, unfair, and grossly oppressive in its operations. It is based on false theories. In practice, it drains away the profits of toil and converts them into treasures of the rich. It takes from one and gives to another.

As I have said elsewhere

A monetary system which thus breeds wealth on one side and poverty on the other, that increases the value of the unit of measurement and correspondingly diminishes the value of the articles which are charged with the payment of debts and taxes, thus taking from the great body of the people and giving to a few, is vicious. It is evil and only evil, and that continually.

If gold and silver had nothing but their weight stamped upon them, they might be used in trade as corn and cotton are used; but when they have a fixed value attached to them by law and are made money in which all other money is to be redeemed, and to measure all other values which fluctuate as the market rises or falls, then they become a means of evil.

To procure a livelihood is the object of toil—all toil—and for that reason values ought to be regulated by the market for things that people produce and out of the proceeds of whose sales they get their living. The waters of the ocean rise and fall in the ebbing and the flowing of the tides, and a placid surface is sometimes lashed into fury by the force of tempests and storms, yet the general level of the sea is maintained. So it ought to be in commercial life. The unit of value among men ought to be a common divisor of all values determined in the open market. It would rise and fall with the general price level and would be justly redeemable in such units. Money should need no redemption. It ought to be made to circulate and not to lie idle in tills and vaults. All money should be good money—money that the Government will receive in payment of taxes and all other dues and demands. What the Government receives as money the people of these United States will never repudiate. Reception of money is its redemption, no matter who pays it. The Government has no more authority to determine the value of gold than it has to determine the value of corn. It has no authority to fix the value of any commodity. Congress is authorized to regulate the value of coin, but not of bullion. And the coin value is a money value, not a market value.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The Secretary. A bill (H. R. 3656) providing for free homesteads on the public lands in Oklahoma Territory for actual and bona fide settlers, and reserving the public lands for that purpose.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside, not losing its place as unfinished business, until the Secretar force.

until the Senator from Kansas can complete his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, the only redemption money needs is circulation. Money so redeemed is fair to rich and poor alike, and if borrowers could get the use of it at rates they can afford to pay, business would never lag, for men could not then afford to let their money lie idle. Farming and manufacturing would be as profitable as the lending of money.

We are now using private credit in more than 90 per cent of our business transactions; and it is matter of necessity. It has come about just as the use of commercial paper came about in the come about just as the use of commercial paper came about in the come about just as the use of commercial paper came about in the early history of banking. But private credit is sometimes precarious, and especially is this true when we are doing business on a metallic basis, when all debts and dues must be paid in gold or in currency redeemable in gold. We are now using the public credit to some extent, but we need to nationalize it and coin it into money. Then it will not only afford ample capital and an abundant currency, but it will ease the force of panics and breed loyalty among the people.

APPENDIX A. [From the Pall Mall Gazette.] WORLD'S DEBTS INCREASING.

Whether it be a good or a bad thing for the nations, there is no room to doubt that the debts of the world are growing steadily. In 1875 it was computed that they stood at £4,750,000,000, as compared with a round £4,200,000,000 two years earlier. On the basis of figures, many of which have been obtained by us at first hand, and are likely on that account to be more accurate than some of the wild guesses to which certain irresponsible statisticians have treated us, we ourselves estimate that the indebtedness of the world to-day stands at £5,800,000,000. As probably everyone knows, France has the doubtful distinction of being the country which has the largest debt. The latest figures put the total at something like £1,200,000,000, which is nearly double the debt—£600,000,000—of Great Britain, which ranks as second on the list. Russia follows with a total of £575,000,000, and insignificant Italy comes fourth with £506,000,000—that is, if we count as separate items the joint debt of Austria-Hungary and the individual debts of the two portions of the nation. The joint debt stood in 1895 at £275,900,000; while the debt of Austria alone was £122,678,600, and that of Hungary alone £207,729,000, or £606,397,600 in all. The United States debt amounts to £339,000,000, and that of Spain—exclusive of the more recent loans in prosecution of the war in Cuba—at £279,000,000. In the following statement we give a comparison for 1875 and 1895 of the indebtedness of the nations which now owe, or did then owe, £100,000,000,000 or over:

France Great Britain. Russia Italy United States Spain Austria-Hungary Germany Australasia Turkey Portugal India Brazil Egypt	£900,000,000 780,000,000 340,000,000 340,000,000 440,000,000 375,000,000 200,000,000 46,000,000 135,000,000 69,000,000 130,000,000 94,000,000 75,000,000	£1, 290, 000, 000 680, 000, 000 575, 000, 000 339, 000, 000 279, 000, 000 84, 000, 000 180, 000, 000 180, 000, 000 153, 000, 000 127, 000, 000 118, 000, 000 100, 000, 000
Total	4,324,000,000	5, 172, 000, 000

In spite of the substantial reduction of the English, American, Spanish, and German debts, there is a net increase for the fourteen nations in the twenty years of £348,000,000. It may be added that in 1885 these same twelve nations owed £4,140,000,000, made up thus: France, £998,000,000; Great Britain, £740,600,000; Italy, £455,000,000; Russia, £381,000,000; United States, £379,000,000; Spain, £270,000,000; India, £127,000,000; Turkey, £127,000,000; Australasia, £98,600,000, and Portugal, £83,000,000. In the years 1875-1885 there was on this showing a net reduction of about £15,000,000 on the indebtedness of the nations enumerated; but the whole world's obligations in 1885 represented an increase on 1875, our calculations giving a total for the former of nearly £4,900,000,000. Among the minor debtors, Belgium has increased its obligations from £71,000,000 in 1875 to £91,000,000 in 1895, and in the same time the debt of the Netherlands has gone up from £80,000,000 to £92,500,000, and that of Canada from £30,000,000 to £51,300,000. The Greek debt stands at £32,984,000, and that of Mexico at £32,720,000 (as against £63,500,000 in 1875); while among the new borrowers must be reckoned Japan, which now owes £47,300,000, and the Argentine Republic, which owes about £74,000,000. For the small borrowers—Bulgaria, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Chile, Peru, Servia, etc.—we have allowed £150,000,000, which is probably only two-thirds of the actual obligations of these nations.

The sum paid annually as interest on the world's debts approximates to £230,000,000. Twenty years ago the total was about £200,000,000, and the increase of only £30,000,000, with a capital addition of more than £1,000,000, is explained by the fact that money now is cheaper, provided credits are good, than it was in 1875, when, on some of its loans, England was paying $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent; India, $4$ per cent; Hulgary, $7$ per cent; Hulgary be something wrong with Burdett's figures. In Portugal the amount is 15s. 10d. per head, and in Egypt 11s. 10d. per head. In Germany it is no more than 1s. 4d.

Can anyone say offhand what is the aggregate debt of all the English possessions in all parts of the globe? We will give the total—it is £1.097,166,600. After the mother country, India has the heaviest debt, the total being, as as we have seen, £127,600,000. Then comes New South Wales with £38,225,000, Canada with £51,288,000 (net), Victoria with £47,937,300, New Zealand with £30,639,500, Cape Colony with £27,675,178, and South Australia with £23,100,000. St. Helena brings up the rear with a modest £5,408.

Mr. President, the joint resolution has been read twice. I ask that it may be now placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks that the joint resolution, which has been twice read, be now placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. FRYE. Has the joint resolution ever been referred to a committee?

Mr. PEFFER. It has not been referred to a committee, Mr. FRYE. Ought it not to be referred to the Committee on Finance

Mr. PEFFER. I would rather have it go on the Calendar, so that it may come up in the regular order for discussion.

Mr. FRYE. Under the rule it should be referred.

Mr. PEFFER. The Senator will remember that the word "may" is used in the rule, and it is not used in such connection as to mean "shall."

Mr. PEFFER. That may be true, Mr. President, but we have any number of instances within the recollection of all of us where a proceeding of this kind has been pursued after a second reading. It has been asked as a special favor in several instances, I know. I do not ask this as a special favor, but I think it is the rule.

Mr. FRYE. It ought not to be done, but at the same time I shall not undertake to make any motion in regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?
Mr. HILL. Does it require unanimous consent?

Mr. PEFFER. I do not think it does require unanimous consent. I think it would require a motion to prevent it from going to the Calendar to the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that a motion to refer is in order and will be entertained by the Chair if made.

Mr. HILL. That is not quite the precise question I asked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the joint resolution will go to the Calendar unless such a motion is made.

Mr. PLATT. Has the joint resolution been read twice?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution has been twice read, the Chair will state.

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas the propriety of having a committee examine this proposition. The difficulty about it is that some day, when perhaps there is not a very large attendance in the Senate, the matter may be brought up immediately, and not having been considered by any committee, Senators attendance in the Senate, the matter may be brought up immediately, and not having been considered by any committee, Senators may not be prepared to act upon it as intelligently as they otherwise would. I suggest to the Senator whether in the end it would not expedite the measure to have it referred?

Mr. PEFFER. It undoubtedly would take the course of other measures. An objection would pass it over, under Rule IX, when it was reached in the regular way, and all Senators would have notice of it. It would certainly be taken up under Rule VIII first, and on an objection it would be passed over.

Mr. HILL. I assume that an important measure like this ought

Mr. HILL. I assume that an important measure like this ought Mr. Hill. I assume that an important measure like this ought to have the consideration of a committee of the Senate. I am not now going to discuss the merits of the proposition. It involves a good deal; it requires a large amount of investigation. It involves, to a certain extent, the whole financial subject; and everything that we have had upon that subject has been referred to a committee and reported. I do not know of any important measure such set his is that he not heave referred to a transition of the as this is that has not been referred to a standing committee of the as this is that has not been referred to a standing committee of the Senate, and I do not know why the joint resolution should not be referred. The Senator from Kansas does not ask any special favor about it. Therefore I think, like any other bill relating to the finances, it ought to be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have the rule relating to the matter read to the Senate. The Secretary will read a sindicated.

as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE IV.

4. Every bill and joint resolution reported from a committee, not having previously been read, shall be read once, and twice, if not objected to, on the same day, and placed on the Calendar in the order in which the same may be reported; and every bill and joint resolution introduced on leave, and every bill and joint resolution of the House of Representatives which shall have received a first and second reading without being referred to a committee, shall, if objection be made to further proceeding thereon, be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. PLATT. The practice, I think, is that we have two Calendars. We have one on which bills reported go, and we have another to which resolutions and such matters as have not been another to which resolutions and such matters as have not been to a committee, but have been before the Senate and talked about, go, which is called in common phrase the table calendar. I understand that the request now is that the joint resolution shall go on the regular Calendar with matters which have been reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas has not been specific in his request, but a motion to refer will be entertained. That will dispose of the matter.

Mr. HILL. I was going to appeal to the Senator from Kansas

Mr. HILL. I was going to appeal to the Senator from Kansas, to his sense of propriety, that he consent that the joint resolution be referred to the Finance Committee.

Mr. PEFFER. The only time since the Senator from New York and I have been associated in this Chamber that I did not consent to a request that he made was during our discussion upon the resoto a request that he made was during our discussion upon the resolution to appoint a committee to investigate the bond transactions. It was the only time, I say, that I did not concur in the Senator's request, and now I am willing to yield to the Senator's appeal and let the matter go to the Committee on Finance if he insists upon it.

Mr. HILL. The Senator consents to it. By unanimous consent the joint resolution can be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

ferred to the Committee on Finance.

DEATH OF CHARLES GOVIN.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 22d ultimo, a report from the Secretary of State, accompanied by copies of correspondence concerning the death of Charles Govin, a citizen of the United States, in the Island of Cuba. GROVER CLEYELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, January 5, 1897.

Mr. CALL. I ask that the message may be printed; and I sup-pose it should be referred properly to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

FREE HOMESTEADS IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the unfinished business be laid. before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3656) providing for free homesteads on the public lands in Oklahoma Territory, for actual and bona fide settlers, and reserving the public lands for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the bill has been read at length. There are now certain amendments pending.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask to have the bill read at length, with the amendments reported from the Committee on Public

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first amendment will be read.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have the bill read at length

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to have the bill read at length as proposed to be amended.
Mr. COCKRELL. Before the bill is read, I should like to ask a question. Has the report in the case been read?
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it has been read, and that it has also been printed in the RECORD.
Mr. COCKRELL. How about the minority report? I have never heard it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The minority report has been printed in the RECORD, but it was not read at length.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear that read. I have not been able to find a minority report thus far.

Mr. MORRILL. Evidently the bill is of vastly too great importance to be considered when the Senate is as thin as it is to-day. There is hardly a quorum present at this time, and as the bill is a very important one, proposing to repeal laws that were established in relation to land equal in amount to thirty or forty million dollars, and involving the question whether the Government shall be reimbursed that sum or not, I ask that the measure be postponed for one week. I do not think that we are likely to have a full Senate week. I hope the bill will be restricted for a week.

nave a full Senate here the present week. I hope the bill will be postponed for a week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the bill be postponed for one week. The Chair understands the request to be that it be postponed without losing its place as unfinished business at that time.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Do I understand that the Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the bill be put over for one week?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the request which has been submitted to the Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. To that, of course, I shall object.

Mr. FRYE. If the Senator will pardon me, in order to find out whether there is a quorum of Senators in the Chamber, I suggest the lack of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine suggests the want of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Lodge,	Proctor,
Allen,	Daniel.	McBride.	Pugh,
Bacon,	Davis.	McMillan,	Sewell.
Baker,	Faulkner,	- Martin.	Shoup,
Berry,	Frye,	Mitchell, Wis.	Smith.
Burrows,	Gear,	Morgan,	Stewart,
Call.	Gray,	Morrill,	Teller.
Cannon,	Hale,	Murphy,	Tillman.
Carter,	Harris,	Pasco,	Walthall.
Chandler,	Hawley,	Peffer.	Wetmore,
Chilton,	Hill,	Perkins.	White.
Clark.	Hoar,	Pettigrew,
Cockrell.	Jones, Ark.	Platt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may go over until to-morrow, when I trust the attendance will be larger than it is to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the bill go over until to-morrow as the unfinished business without losing its place. Is there objection?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not think I shall object to that request. I am simply desirous that the bill shall be considered by the Senate and disposed of, and of course anxious that delay shall not place it in such a position that it will not be disposed of at this session. Believing, of course, that the request is made not for the purpose of delay or to hinder in any way the consideration of the bill, I will consent that it shall go over and be the unfinished business for to-morrow, but to-morrow I shall insist upon its consideration without further delay.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to suggest that if the Senate delays this matter it does not hurt the bill which is entitled to precedence so much as it does other bills that come after it. If the bill in charge of the Senator from South Dakota is to go over, I should like the consent of the Senate for the consideration of the not place it in such a position that it will not be disposed of at this

R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted, which is also a special order and has been such ever since the 15th of April, 1896. Our law in regard to the penalty of death is simply a relic of the barbarism of the past. I ask that that bill may be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]?

Mr. HARRIS. Let the title of the bill be read. I did not hear what it was

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The title of the bill referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The immediate question before the Senate is the request of the Senator from Vermont, which is that the pending business be laid aside informally until to-morrow morning. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PETTIGREW. 1t is to retain its place as the unfinished business

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is to retain its place as the unfinished business, the bill being only informally laid aside.

INFLICTION OF DEATH PENALTY.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate for the consideration at this time of the bill which I have named.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be stated by title.

Mr. FRYE. Let it be read in full for the information of the Senate, please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read in full for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted, as follows:

which the penalty of death may be inflicted, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in all cases where the accused is found guilty of the crime of murder, or of rape under sections 5339 or 5345. Revised Statutes, the jury may qualify their verdict by adding thereto "without capital punishment;" and whenever the jury shall return a verdict qualified as aforesaid the person convicted shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life.

Sec. 2. That except offenses mentioned in sections 5332, 1342, 1624, 5339, and 5345, Revised Statutes, when a person is convicted of any offense to which the punishment of death is now specifically affixed by the laws of the United States, he shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life, and when any person is convicted of an offense to which the punishment of death, or a lesser punishment, in the discretion of the court, is affixed, the maximum punishment shall be imprisonment at hard labor for life.

Sec. 3. That the punishment of death prescribed for any offense specified by the statutes of the United States, except in sections 5332, 1342, 1624, 5339, and 5345, Revised Statutes, is hereby abolished, and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Sec. 4. That nothing herein contained shall apply to or in any way affect any proceeding or indictment now found or pending or that may be found for any offense committed before the passage of this act, and all offenses committed before the passage of this act, and the sentences shall be imposed as therein provided.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 5. That any Indian who shall commit the offense of rape within the limits of any Indian reservation shall be punished by imprisonment at the discretion of the court. So much of the ninth section of chapter 341 of the acts of the year 1885 as is inconsistent herewith is herewith repealed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if this would not be a good place to insert a provision in regard to jurisdiction of the courts in offenses committed in the Indian reservations? Is there not such a bill as that pending before the committee of which the Senator from Massachusetts is chairman?

Mr. HOAR. I should think that would be the subject of a sepa-

Mr. HOAR. I should think that would be the subject of a separate report, but I hope it will not be permitted to interfere with this bill, as it would very likely embarrass or delay its passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator and his committee will give attention to the matter to which I have referred.

Mr. HOAR. I will. The committee have that bill before them. I will state that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS] has, as a subcommittee, the matter of Indian jurisdiction, with which he is very familiar, in charge. He will make a report, I have no doubt, at an early day. doubt, at an early day.

Mr. HAWLEY. I see a feature of this bill the wording of which I do not quite like. I see it is provided in section 2—

That except offenses mentioned in sections 5832, 1342, 1624, 5339, and 5345, Revised Statutes, when a person is convicted of any offense to which the punishment of death is now specifically affixed by the laws of the United States, he shall be sentenced to imprisonment at hard labor for life, etc.

Mr. HOAR: If the Senator will pardon me, those are offenses provided for in the Articles of War, with the exception of treason, and treason has a special provision, so that the punishment of treason is much milder; that is, this bill reduces the punishment for certain offenses, if the jury shall so find, to imprisonment for life; but in cases of treason the punishment has already been reduced, at the discretion of the court, to imprisonment for a term of years. It would take a very long bill to enumerate all the offenses mentioned in the Articles of War and those regarding the

Mr. HAWLEY. All that is referred to here is contained in those sections of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; it is all contained in those sections.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.
The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

TERMS OF PRESIDENT AND REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. PROCTOR. I wish to give notice that on Monday next, on the completion of the morning business, I shall ask to have taken up, for the purpose of briefly addressing the Senate regarding them, Orders of Business 62 and 63 of subjects on the table, being joint resolutions introduced by me relating to the Presidential term and the terms of members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ALDRICH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 6, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Tuesday, January 5, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, December 22, 1896, was read and approved.

CERTAIN LANDS IN KANSAS.

CERTAIN LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker—
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Broderick] desires to present a request. This requires unanimous consent, because the provisions of the rule already adopted require the House to go into Committee of the Whole. If there be no objection, the gentleman will be allowed to submit his request. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BRODERICK. I desire to submit a resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. If it provokes any discussion, I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.
The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution relating to Union Pacific Railway lands.

Whereas there are large and valuable tracts of land, situate in the State of Kansas, which were embraced in the grant made by the Government to the Union Pacific Railway Company to which patents have not yet been issued;

Union Pacific Railway Company to which patents have not yet been issued; and

Whereas most of these lands have been sold by said railway company to bona fide purchasers who are in possession and who have made lasting and valuable improvements thereon; and

Whereas the United States land officers at the Topeka, Kans., land office have allowed and are allowing homestead entries to be made upon these lands without any apparent legal authority: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to report to this House the cause of the omission to issue patents to said lands and the authority under which the United States land officers at Topeka, Kans., pretend to act in permitting these entries to be made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

of the resolution?

Mr. LACEY. I should like to hear some statement from the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Broderick] before unanimous consent is given.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, the facts are recited in the preamble to the resolution. These lands were granted to the railroad company, but for some reason which is not generally understood patents have not been issued, and men are going to the Topeka land office now and making pretended homestead entries upon these lands.

These lands have been in the possession of the present owners in many instances for twenty or twenty-five years. They have been paid for, occupied, and the owners have made valuable improvements upon them, but the Department has omitted to issue the patents. We simply ask why this omission has been made, and ask under what authority, if any, these lands are being homesteaded.

Mr. LACEY. As I understand, then, this only asks for information from the Department?

Mr. BRODERICK. It asks only for information. It is simply a resolution of inquiry. An official report of the facts is all that is desired at this time. Other steps may be taken later if the answer to this resolution warrants further action.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection. The resolution was agreed to.

SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] demands the regular order. Consequently, under the rule already adopted, the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 4566, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] will please take the chair.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4566) to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4566) to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, the bill has already been read and printed in the RECORD, and I ask that the reading of it be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk is simply reporting the title of the bill.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the rule under which we are now proceeding be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on Tucsday, January 5, 1897, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. No. 4596, a bill to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter; that said bill shall be considered under the rules governing general debate during the said day and the following day, January 6, until the hour of 2 p. m., at which time general debate shall close, and said bill shall then be open to amendment and consideration under the five-minute rule until 4 p. m., at which time the committee shall rise and report the bill and pending amendments to the House. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the pending amendments and bill to its final passage.

Mr. QUIGG. I should like to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] if he has any suggestion to make about the time to be consumed in general debate.

Mr. LOUD. In view of the limited time for debate, and the very many requests for opportunity to speak, it seems to me that the time can be better distributed by a gentleman on this side and one on the other; that it would be better to parcel it out in that manner than to allow individual members to secure the floor who would be entitled to an hour each. I would make that suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. Quigg] if he desires to be recognized.

Mr. LOUD. I make that request, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from New York be allowed to control the time in opposition to the bill, and that I may be allowed to control it on the

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York may be permitted to control one-half of the time against the bill, and the gentleman from California [Mr. Loup], on behalf of the committee, on the other side. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. QUIGG. Does the gentleman from California desire to roceed with the remainder of his time that was not used by him the other day?

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman from New York is ready to proceed, in view of the fact that I have occupied so much time, I would prefer to wait until later on in the debate.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, in presenting this bill to the consideration of the House the other day, the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] enlarged upon its importance. I desire to concur in the view that he then expressed—that this is the most important measure that has been under consideration here during the present session of Congress, and it is likely to be the most important bill that we shall have to consider, save, possibly, the funding bill presently to be acted on. I concur in this view the more earnestly because there is very little else that the gentleman from California said with which I can entirely agree.

This bill is not only important, it is revolutionary; and it is not less reactionary than revolutionary. If this bill passes, for the first time since the Post-Office Department was established Congress will have taken a step backward in the liberal policy it has maintained with regard to the public uses of the post-office. If this bill passes, privileges and rights will be withdrawn and denied which have existed for half a century, privileges and rights so widely availed of that industries have been built upon them, trades and businesses established, and conditions of production and barter fixed. If this bill passes, a blow will be struck at every occupation connected with the art of printing and the business of publishing, circulating, and selling the product of the printing press. If this is so, and anybody can see at a glance that it is so, no argument is needed to enforce the assertion that we should be sure of our ground and be fully persuaded of compensating results to the public interest before we give our approval to such radical, such injurious and far-reaching legislation.

Two pretenses are made with which to justify this bill. The first is that the mails are now being used in a way that the law did not intend or contemplate and that by this bill we are simply providing against abuses. The second is that its passage will save to the public Treasury the sum which the gentleman from California, by mathematical processes that are altogether bewildering, variously estimates from ten to forty millions of dollars. If either of these pretenses could be established, if they were even credible, I should certainly support the bill in spite of the grievous injuries that its enactment must entail upon the industries and occupations to which I have just referred. But the facts in the case conclusively prove that the uses of the mails which this bill seeks to prevent were held in full contemplation when the law took its present shape, have since been repeatedly confirmed, and that the effect of the bill more the contemplation. that the effect of the bill upon the revenue and expenditure of the Post-Office Department is altogether problematical. Indeed, I think that the House will see before this debate is concluded that the inevitable loss of revenues in first and fourth class postage will be quite as great as any possible saving by reason of the reduc-tion of the cost of mail transportation and that the net effect of the bill will be to produce disaster to printers, binders, publishers, newsdealers, and paper manufacturers, without materially affectnewsdealers, and paper manufacturers, without materially affecting the financial condition of the post-office.

The difficulty, Mr. Chairman, which the Post-Office Department has experienced in comprehending the fact that it is the positive and assured purpose of the law to permit all publications not obscene or indecent to be sent through the mails to subscribers and dealers when issued at stated intervals from a known of multiplication and who not account with a second with the second state of multiplication and who not account with a second with a second with the second state of multiplication and who not account with a second with a second state of multiplication and who not account with a second state of multiplication and subscribes and second state of multiplication and second secon office of publication, and when not covered with a permanent binding, is not easy to understand. The statute by which this privilege was expressly conferred was enacted in 1845, more than fifty years ago. It contained this provision:

All letters, newspapers, and all magazines and pamphlets periodically published, or which may be published in regular series or in successive numbers under the same title, shall be designated as second-class matter.

I am not able to say at what particular time publishers of books began to issue their publications in serial form, but it was at some time subsequently to the passage of this law and prior to the act of 1879, which is the existing statute with regard to second-class matter and the statute which the pending bill purposes to amend. It came about as the result of the wonderful improvement in printing machines and the marvelous processes by which the cost of paper making was reduced. Now, I ask the committee while I run over the history of this matter to bear in mind the fact that of the history of this matter to bear in mind the fact that the gentleman from California, echoing the voice of the Post-Office Department, alleges that existing law did not intend to permit the circulation through the mails at pound rates of serial publications which are books. He said in this report with which he accompanied the bill:

We have oftentimes wondered why a long-suffering people have remained practically silent through all these years, for 60,000,000 people have long been taxed from thirty to forty million dollars a year more than it costs to transmit their mail matter in order that a very small privileged class, embracing but a few thousand, might be indulged in the luxury of pursuing a legitimate and in most cases a very profitable business.

From that language we might infer that our friend had reference to the whole of this second-class business, and not to the particular "abuses" at which he says this bill aims. But in his speech on December 15 he interpreted the remark in his report and commented on it as follows:

Now, this bill presents to this body the opportunity to relieve the country from a deficiency of $10,000,000 already existing in the service of the Post-Office Department, and to give to it in addition a revenue of $10,000,000 more, At the lowest calculation there is involved in this bill a saving to the Government of $20,000,000 per annum, and if we may take the figures of Post-master-General Wanamaker, acknowledged to be a good business man, and who was at that time in a position to know whereof he spoke—if we may take his estimate made in 1892, we must come to the conclusion that this iniquity—I will term it iniquity—costs our people more than $40,000,000 annually.

I called the gentleman's attention on December 19, when the rule under which this discussion is proceeding was brought into the House by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], to the the House by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], to the fact that he had said that we were thus going to save from $20,000,000 to $40,000,000 which were caused to be expended by this "iniquity." The gentleman from California did not wish to have it understood, evidently, that when he brought in his appropriation bill his forty-million-dollar saving would show there. I questioned him at that time particularly on this point of the saving to the revenue, because that is the only reason why anybody in this House will want to vote for the bill.

If this bill passes, it will pass because the gentleman from California has persuaded the House that the law never intended to confer these privileges, and because he has persuaded the House confer these privileges, and because he has persuaded the House that a huge sum of money will be saved by forbidding the mails that a huge sum of money will be saved by forbidding the mails to periodically issued paper books and sample copies of newspapers. So that unless he comes in here with an appropriation bill that carries out his pretenses—I do not wish to use the word "pretenses" as relating to the gentleman from California, so I will say a bill that carries out his assurances—unless he comes in here with such an appropriation bill, certainly the House will, be in a position to say that it voted under a misapprehension. When I warned the gentleman from California on December 19 that it was from twenty to forty millions that he had claimed he was going to save—and I suggest here that there is a good, big "hedge" between twenty and forty millions—he replied as follows:

The chairman of the Post-Office Committee has made no statement that this bill will save from twenty to forty millions a year. The claim that he has made, which I have repeated to many gentlemen, is that this bill will probably save ten millions a year.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have quoted the language of the gentleman from California where he said that this postal business which he proposes to stop costs $40,000,000 annually; then I have read his language where he says that Mr. Wanamaker states that it costs forty millions; then I have read his language where he says that if his bill passes it will save twenty millions—ten millions by reducing expenditures and ten by adding to the revenues; and lastly, I have just read his statement that it is only ten millions he is going to save. Now, I want to say to the gentleman from California that he will not save even ten millions. When he talks about mail matter being carried at 8 cents a pound, he uses a thoroughly misleading expression, and it has misled him woefully. It assumes that there are no fixed charges in the Post-Office Department.

If this bill passes, the gentleman is not going to reduce the num-

If this bill passes, the gentleman is not going to reduce the number of post-offices by a single one; he is not going to reduce the number of postmasters; he is not going to reduce the number of post-office clerks; he is not going to reduce the number of railway mail clerks; he is not going to reduce the number of carriers. The only reduction that he can possibly effect is in the one solitary item of the cost of transportation on the railroads. That is the one place where any saving can be effected, and the saving that he will effect there will not be ten millions nor two millions. This second-class mail matter has not increased invariably from year to year, as the gentleman from California intimates that it has. It year, as the gentleman from California intimates that it has. It did not increase, for instance, in the year 1894 over the year 1893. On the contrary, there was a decrease in the amount of second-class matter carried; but there was an increase in the amount of postal expenditure for that year. The compensation to postmasters increased, the compensation to carriers increased, the cost of star routes increased, the cost of railroad transportation increased more than a million and a half of dollars, the cost of post-office car service increased, the cost for steamboat service increased, and the cost for railway mail clerks increased. There was an increase of expenditure all along the line. I have the figures here showing a large increase in every item.

Now, the weight of mail matter carried in that year was substantially the same as in the year before, and the weight of second-class matter slightly declined. What, then, accounts for the increased expenses? Why, the distance covered by the mails was 15,000,000 miles greater than in the preceding year. There were 716 new star routes; there were 77 new railroad routes; there were 207 additional mail clerks; there were 402 new post-offices; there were 211 additions to the postal clerks; there were 111 additions to the force of carriers. So the increase in the mail service of this vast and growing country of ours must go on from year to year, and the gentleman from California is not going to reduce it. I shall come presently in the course of my remarks to a clear statement of how the compensation of the railroads is determined, ment of how the compensation of the railroads is determined, and the committee will then see that a reduction of the weight of mail matter to be carried involves in no respect a proportionate reduction of expense even for transportation.

Mr. HENDERSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDERSON. Those of us who are not familiar with the evidence put before the Post-Office Committee, and who have not had time to examine the reports, would like to know exactly what the issue is between the gentleman from New York and those representing the other side. If the gentleman will indicate the rates of the different classes of mail matter carried, and what kinds of matter will be transferred under this bill from one class to another, we shall probably be better able to follow his line of

Mr. QUIGG. I am extremely obliged to the gentleman from Iowa for his suggestion. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes all sorts of changes in the existing law, but there are two which are especially radical. Before the debate is concluded I will try to indicate all of the proposed changes, but these two are the great, the serious and important ones. First, the bill forbids access to the mails to periodical publications which are books. Now, periodical publications, whether they are books or newspapers—their characteristics being defined by statute—are admitted to the mails under the act of 1879 as second-class matter, and by the act of 1885 the postage rate for second-class matter was fixed at 1 cent a pound. the postage rate for second-class matter was fixed at 1 cent a pound. The rate at which these second-class publications are carried has been variously altered during the last fifty years, but the original law, preceding that of 1879, giving to them second-class privileges, was passed in 1845, and has not been changed subsequently except in the direction of greater liberality. Its language I have already quoted. The present law, however, is the act of 1879, and it is this act which the pending bill amends.

The act of 1879 with regard to second-class matter says that it

The act of 1879 with regard to second-class matter says that it must have these four characteristics:

First. It must be regularly issued at stated intervals, as frequently as four mes a year, and bear a date of issue, and be numbered consecutively.

That establishes its periodical character.

Second. It must be issued from a known office of publication.

That fixes its identity.

Third. It must be formed of printed sheets, without board, cloth, leather, rother substantial binding, such as distinguishes printed books for preseration—from periodical publications.

And, fourth. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of and, formation of a public character, or be devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and it must have a legitimate list of subscribers:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates.

Now, Mr. Chairman, those are the statutory characteristics which a publication must possess in order to be admitted to the mails as second-class matter. It is proposed by the gentleman from California in this bill so to change the law that those periodical publications which are books shall not be carried as second-class matter, but must go into the third class, and pay 8 cents a pound instead of 1 cent.

odical publications which are books shall not be carried as secondclass matter, but must go into the third class, and pay 8 cents a pound instead of 1 cent.

He proposes one other change. There has existed in this country since, I think, 1879—the gentleman from California will correct me if I am wrong in the date—a privilege to newspapers that allows them to send, at the rate of 1 cent a pound, sample copies of their publications to individuals everywhere—wherever they are to be reached by the mails. The object of this law was to enable newspapers to extend their circulation throughout the country. The gentleman from California proposes to stop that law; to cut off that privilege; to prevent the exercise of it by any newspaper at any time under any circumstances.

Mr. HENDERSON. What is the regular rate on newspapers?
Mr. QUIGG. A cent a pound. But they must be sent to subscribers only—paid subscribers. The law does not give permission for newspapers to be sent at the pound rate to those who are not subscribers unless the papers be sent as sample copies. And if any newspaper is sent as a sample copy to the same person repeatedly, every postmaster is directed to notify the fact to the Department, which fact deprives that paper of its second-class privilege, if the postmaster chooses to exercise his authority.

Mr. HEPBURN. Under this privilege of sending sample copies, as the law is construed, is it not possible for a publisher to send to one person, say, a hundred copies of his publication marked as sample copies, under one cover—

Mr. QUIGG. Several copies; yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. And is it not possible for the person who receives those hundred copies, if he should sell only 10 of them, to return the 90 unsold copies at 1 cent a pound?

Mr. QUIGG. Oh, that is not possible. They must not be sent for any such purpose. The law is carefully guarded. Sample copies can not be sent to dealers.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to get at the fact as to the manner in which this privilege is used.

Mr. Publick. Here the precion which the gentleman from California seeks to make in the law, I desire to return to his allegation that this privilege of sending books through the mail was never intended to be granted.

The gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] referred in his speech to the decision of an Attorney-General from which he dates the book privilege. This is his language:

For my part I do not believe that it was ever intended by Congress that serial novels should pass through the mails at pound rates, a privilege originally vested in the newspapers of the country, and confined to them up to 1879, when, by a ruling of the Attorney-General at that time, General Devens, it was held that books issued in serial numbers are entitled to be carried at second class rates, under the rather loose phraseology of the law.

And this is the view of the present Postmaster-General, as it has been the view of previous Postmasters-General; and the present official at the head of the Post-Office Department makes bold to say that if we do not pass this bill he will pass it himself. He says:

But for the hope that Congres

This, I will state, is from his report for the current year-

But for the hope that Congress would enact the bill now on the House Calendar, I should have taken the responsibility to modify and reverse the successive rulings through which this inroad on the service has been effected and to exclude from the benefit of second-class rates the serial libraries and other publications not in the policy of the law, even within the letter of its rather loose phraseology.

So that this present Postmaster-General gives us to understand that if we reject this bill he will enact it into a law himself; and now let us see what it is that he must ignore in addition to the now let us see what it is that he must ignore in addition to the adverse action of the present Congress.

This decision of Attorney-General Devens was rendered with reference to a case that arose under the old law, not under the law of 1879. The question arose under that earlier law on the 27th of November, 1878, by the action of the postmaster at New York in refusing to permit one of these serial publications, that was a book, to go through the mail at second-class rates. Attorney-General Devens having interpreted the law, and having held that periodicals might be admitted to the mails provided they conformed with the statutory conditions then existing, and that this book did so conform, the Department came before the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads with precisely this proposition, and here is the language that it employed in its suggestion: osition, and here is the language that it employed in its suggestion:

The Post-Office Department submitted to the House committee the following: "Nothing herein contained"—

Now, understand that the House committee was then considering the rates bill, the bill which I have just read as existing law. The House committee was then considering what became the law of 1879, which it was about to bring into the House for its action; and the gentleman from Illinois, the present chairman of the Com-and the gentleman from Illinois, the present chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, was a member of the committee at that time and can correct me if I err in any statement.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman from New York will permit me, I understood him to suggest, or he left the impression upon my mind, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Hopkins] was a member of the committee in 1879. That I think is a mistake, as he could not have been here at that time.

Mr. QUIGG. My reference was to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. As I understand it, that gentleman's period of service as a mem-

As I understand it, that gentleman's period of service as a member of this House dates from the creation of the Government.

Now, the proposition submitted by the Post-Office Department to the House Post-Office Committee at that time, in 1879, and prior to the enactment of the law, was this:

Nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit publications which, although issued in regular series or successive numbers, are but books, or reprints of books, to the benefit of the privileged rate, whether printed in this country or abroad.

And the committee took this proposition, which is the one we are now considering, and rejected it, and brought in the act as it stands. Does the gentleman from California mean to say now that this law did not intend that books should go through the mails at this reduced rate? Why, this is not all of it. The Postmaster-General who succeeded at that time, Thomas L. James, delivered an address in the city of New York in 1883, in which he referred to this law of 1879, the law that was passed with this Department amendment rejected. This was what Postmaster-General James said: General James said:

The constant tendency of our postal system has been toward the extension of the privileges of the mails in every branch of correspondence and every form of literary production. Its facilities first made possible the cheap publication of newspapers, and later on standard works of literature, by placing upon all periodical popular reading matter the lowest rate of postage ever known in a civilized land. In no other country have the masses ever before enjoyed such an inestimable intellectual privilege, and no money—

Listen to this, gentlemen-

no money expended by the Government in any of its multiform agencies has ever conferred such enormous advantages. This extension of reading good books by the masses—

Do you hear that language? "This extension".

is in itself one of the marks of progress, of civilization, and of the widening benefits of a government of the people and for the people. This impulse and direction, of course, must not be changed.

Why, it seemed absurd to that Postmaster-General. "There must be no steps backward," he said in conclusion. And now will the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] say that the law did not intend to permit these books to go through the mails?

But that is not all the evidence. I mentioned a moment ago that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon] was a member of the committee when this amendment was rejected and the existing law was brought in. In 1888 we had another of these bills before us to keep books out of the mails. This proposition has come up again and again, gentlemen, only to be defeated, and by ever-increasing majorities. When it was up in 1888 the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon] used this language:

Prior to 1879, while I was a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, this class of literature was allowed to pass through the mail at 2 cents a pound. The policy of legislation—

Mark the gentleman's words. The very language which Post-master-General Wilson uses, only the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon] says it was the policy, and Mr. Wilson says it was not. Well, who knows, the man who made the law or the man who was not here then?

Says the gentleman from Wilsois IV.

Says the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]

the policy of legislation being to encourage the dissemination of sound and desirable reading matter among the masses of the people of the country at cheap rates, the question was discussed and the legislation was advisedly had.

You see they were coming before that Congress telling them that the law did not intend to permit these books to go through the mails. That was the plea then, just as it is the plea now, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon] bore his testimony to the fact that "the legislation was advisedly had."

Then subsequently the question came up again and again, and the last time two years ago, when it appeared neatly tucked away in an appropriation bill. The bill was considered under the five-minute rule and the clause was passed before any body discovered.

minute rule, and the clause was passed before anybody discovered what it was, and then such a storm of criticism and protest arose that the gentleman in charge of that bill (Mr. Henderson, of North Carolina) gave us an opportunity in the House to debate that particular paragraph and to vote upon it. It was debated and voted on and rejected by a vote of 182 to 27.

Yet in the light of all these actions, the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud], echoing the Postmaster-General, says that this law did not intend to permit books to go through the mails, and the Postmaster-General gives us to understand that if our action to-day is the same as has heretofore been taken, he will legislate for himself and keep these books out by simply a stroke of his pen. minute rule, and the clause was passed before anybody discovered

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it is pretty well established that the law did intend books to go through the mails, when issued serially, and when not bound for preservation.

But I admit that the policy of continuing the law may yet be considered. If, as the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] says, the sample-copy privilege and the book privilege costs this Government $40,000,000, there can not be any doubt that something ought to be done to check the expense. If, as he says, he is going to save forty millions, or thirty millions, or ten millions, or five millions, I think we ought to vote for his bill. I say he will not save five millions, nor four millions, nor three millions, and I doubt if he saves two. I doubt very much whether the net effect of this bill will be to save a cent. On the contrary, it is my sober belief that if this bill passes the result will be to increase the deficit of the Department. deficit of the Department.

deficit of the Department.

Mr. Chairman, the proposition on which the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] relies to prove that this bill will effect this saving is about as follows—I am not claiming to quote the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud], but I undertake to give the argument of the Post-Office Department and of that gentleman with reference to this bill, and to express it in a few sentences that will enable the committee to understand it perfectly. It asserts that the second-class matter mailed by publishers and news dealers, including the matter circulated free within the county of publication, amounts to 348,988,648 pounds, or 68 per cent of the entire weight of the matter carried; that 52,348,348 pounds of this second-class matter were carried free, consisting of newspapers delivered through the mails to subscribers residing within the county where the paper was printed; that the 296,640,300 pounds remaining, which includes not only these serial publications and sample copies of newspapers, but all the periodical publications of the country, all the daily and weekly newspapers, all the reviews and magazines, paid to the Government a revenue of only $2,966,403; that this matter increases enormously from year to year; that 403; that this matter increases enormously from year to year; that the cost of transporting the mails is about 8 cents a pound; that the second-class matter was therefore carried at an expense of about $28,000,000, and the revenue derived from it being only about $3,000,000, that there was a loss on transportation alone of nearly $25,000,000, and a further loss in handling of even more; that the finances of the Department show a deficit, and that the way to economize is to shut down on books and sample copies.

Now, that is the argument of the committee, but does the committee give us any information to support the argument? Supposing that its statement is true, does the committee tell us what proportion of this second-class matter consists of books and sample copies? Not at all. There is not a word in the gentleman's speech nor a word in his report that throws any real light on the facts. There is only an extract from Mr. Wanamaker, from one of his reports, which went to show that the book matter amounts to reports, which went to show that the book matter amounts to about 50,000 tons—that is, one hundred millions of pounds. That, so far as Mr. Wanamaker is concerned, is a guess. He does not claim to have the fact. He speaks of the amount as substantially 50,000 tons. The committee does not show us what it is.

Now, there exist in this country 2,000 daily newspapers. There are nearly as many weekly newspapers that circulate outside the county in which they are published. There are nearly 300 magazines, some of which circulate, as the Century Magazine, 250,000 copies monthly; and all of this matter goes to make up the 300,000,000 pounds which is carried as second-class matter.

What would be the effect if we should forbid the mails to these sample copies and these books? The gentleman from California says that if they carry 100,000,000 pounds at 8 cents a pound we shall save $8,000,000. But he does not show that they amount to 100,000,000 pounds, nor any other weight, and when you come to 100,000,000 pounds, nor any other weight, and when you come to understand how the weight of matter is paid for you will easily see that the decrease of the heft to be carried does not proportionsee that the decrease of the heft to be carried does not proportionately decrease the expense. Here is the scale of compensation: If a railroad carries 200 pounds of matter per day over the whole of its route it is paid at the end of the year $42.75. If it carries 500 pounds it is paid $64.12. The rate diminishes, you see. If it carries a thousand pounds it is paid $85.50. If it carries 5,000 pounds it is paid $171. Now, note the difference. If it carries 200 pounds it gets $42.75—and these rates are fixed by statute. If it carries ht gets $42.75—and these rates are fixed by statute. If it carries 5,000 pounds it only gets $171, and for every additional 2,000 pounds it gets $21.37. So that a railroad that carries 200 pounds is paid more—is paid twice as much exactly—for its 200 pounds as another road carrying great weights is paid for any additional 2,000 pounds over the weight of 5,000. Not only does the rate fall as the burden increases, but in our contracts we pay for a great many things

Weight is one of the elements of cost, to be sure, but it is only one. We pay for speed, we pay for the length of the route, we pay for the frequency of the carrying, and then we pay for weight, and our rate for weight diminishes in proportion as the bulk of the matter and its weight increase. So that when the gentleman tells us that the rate is 8 cents a pound he says what is misleading, because it is neither accurate nor complete. It is true that we carry 500,000,000 pounds of matter of all kinds, and if we carry 500,000,000 pounds of all kinds of matter and if we spend $90,000,000 for our postal service the cost per pound for handling, delivering, and transportation will be 18 cents. That is plain, and for certain purposes it is true; but it does not follow that you will save 18 cents every time you diminish that weight by a pound. We pay for transportation—I think it is—about $36,000,000, and that would seem to establish a rate of 8 cents per pound. But when you examine the scheme by which the transportation is paid for, you perceive that you do not reduce the expense by 8 cents when you reduce the weight by a pound. Nor for every pound that we add us that the rate is 8 cents a pound he says what is misleading, reduce the weight by a pound. Nor for every pound that we add do we increase it 8 cents. Postmaster-General Wanamaker did not fall into the mistake of computation with which my friend from California has misled himself.

When the gentleman from California said the other day that he When the gentleman from California said the other day that he was going to save either ten, or twenty, or thirty, or forty million dollars, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], who has been at the head of the Post-Office Committee, who considered this bill when he was at the head of that committee, and who is now opposed to it, called attention to the fact that Mr. Wanamaker's statement was that the saving by the exclusion of books would be only about $1,000,000, and that the saving by the exclusion of sample copies would be only one million more. The gentleman from California replied that Mr. Wanamaker had made an obvious mistake, because the cost of transportation was 8 cents a pound, but I think I have shown that it is the gentleman from California who makes the mistake, and that it is erroneous to sav California who makes the mistake, and that it is erroneous to say that the cost is 8 cents a pound, or any other specific sum. Now, what did Mr. Wanamaker say? I will read his statement, and I ask gentlemen to notice closely his language, for it is extremely careful and exact. Mr. Wanamaker says that the weight of books carried is, he thinks, 50,000 tons, and if 50,000 tons, then 100,000,000 pounds. Now, what is going to be the saving by the proposed change according to Mr. Wanamaker? He says:

It is estimated that by the sample-copy abuse over $1,000,000 is annually lost to the revenue.

Mark the language: "Annually lost to the revenue." does not mean that this amount would be added to the revenue by stopping what he calls the "abuse." Then he says further:

In the transportation of paper-covered books, considerably more than a million is kept out of the postal income.

"Kept out of the postal income. That, as gentlemen will see, is very guarded language, and it was doubtless chosen by Mr. Wanamaker because he knew, what the gentleman from California ignores, that the expenses of the Post-Office Department are to a great extent fixed charges, and that so far as they are not fixed they are bound to increase by reason of the extension of the service, and also because Mr. Wanamaker recognized, what the gentleman from California ignores, that the scheme of payment for transportation which is fixed by law does not permit anybody. to say that the cost is so much a pound, because the system of payment is complicated, based upon length of route, based upon frequency of service as well as upon weight, and, in so far as it is based upon weight, diminishing as to the rate in proportion as the weight increase

Now, where will the gentleman from California save this great sum when he comes in here with his appropriation bill? I hope the gentleman is keeping his appropriation bill carefully in mind when he makes his statements of the amount that he is going to when he makes his statements of the amount that he is going to save. One of the chief items of expenditure is the compensation of postmasters, for which we pay $16,000,000; the gentleman from California is not going to pay any less. There is an item of $9,000,000 for clerks; the gentleman from California is not going to pay any less. There is an item for free delivery, which includes carrier service, $12,000,000, and it is going to continue to be just as

There is an item of $6,000,000 for star routes. That is going to increase, and the gentleman from California knows it, because increase, and the gentleman from California knows it, because the needs of the country for mail service are increasing. There is an item of $6,000,000 for postal-car service, and we are going to have the postal cars just the same. There is an item for steamboat service, and there is $7,000,000 for railway mail clerks, and those expenditures are going to be just the same. There is an item for transportation over the railroads, $27,000,000. Perhaps that may be slightly reduced. Perhaps the gentleman may make a saving there of $1,000,000, or even of a million and a half. When you add all these items that I have enumerated, they make up $83,000,000 out of the $90,000,000 that we expend on the Post-Office Department, and the remainder is made up of the cost of manufacturing postage stamps and other items, all of which must go on anyhow. The gentleman from California, therefore, is not go on anyhow. The gentleman from California, therefore, is not going to save $40,000,000, or $20,000,000, or $10,000,000, or any such sum. If he saves a million, he will be very lucky.

But what else will he do? In his remarks the other day the gentleman from California described to us this sample-copy abuse, and I propose now to answer the question that was addressed to me by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn]. Here is what the gentleman from California said about the sample-copy abuse.

The CHAIRMAN (interposing). One hour of the gentleman's me has expired. The Chair presumes the gentleman may extend time has expired. The Chair presumes the gentleman may extend his own time if there is no objection.

Mr. QUIGG. I shall not detain the committee very much longer, as I propose to be considerate of others. The gentleman from California said:

Here is an advertising journal seeking admission to the Post-Office Department with second-class privileges. Its nominal list of subscribers, of patrons, permit me to say, is 250 copies. It secures certain advertising and then circulates through sample copies as many as a million and a half or two million copies, an unlimited number, if you please, at the expense of the United States Government and the people.

Is that so? If it is, this is not the law that the gentleman should ask us to consider. He ought to bring in a bill impeaching somebody. What he describes as being done is as much an offense against the existing law as it possibly could be against the pending bill or any that could be devised. I read a few minutes ago the characteristics of second-class matter. Listen to this one:

Nothing herein contained-

Says the law-

shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates.

Why, Mr. Chairman, that law covers this case perfectly. What the gentleman from California says has been done could not be done except with the connivance and complicity of the post-office authorities. Every postmaster in the country is instructed to report all such abuses, and if any such abuse occurs the journal that commits it is written out of the mails at once, as it ought to be. And the rules made by the Post-Office Department to give effect to the statute cover this case in specific terms. Why, when a man applies for the pound rate, here is the affidavit that he is required to take. He must say whether he prints a newspaper or magazine, how often it is published, where it is published, who its proprietors are, whether he is in any way interested in any business that it advertises, who its editors are, and how their compensation is determined.

Do you see that point? The trade is

Do you see that point? That rule is made to reach the question whether his editors are paid out of the advertisers' profits, and if so, the journal can not circulate as second-class matter. He must say, too, whether the editors have any pecuniary interest in any business or trade that is advertised; whether the publication is open to the advertisement of any reputable house. He must tell how many advertisements he prints. He must tell what his home open to the advertisement of any reputable house. He must tell how many advertisements he prints. He must tell what his bona fide circulation is. He must tell what the subscription price of his publication is per annum. And he must tell the average number of sample copies sent out with each issue, and how he gets the names of the persons to whom he sends these sample copies. then, if the Department is satisfied with his statements on these then, if the Department is satisfied with his statements on these points, it allows the journal to circulate, and if the Department is not satisfied it has the right, under existing law, to rule it out.

The gentleman referred in his remarks to a newspaper called Comfort, which he said was one of the "abuses." He said it had an honest circulation of only about 1,000 copies, although it sends through the mails a million and a quarter. That, of course, could be a constitute of the course, could be a constitute of the course, could be a constitute of the course. not be so unless the Department chose to permit the fraud. But is it so at all? Here is a letter from the editor of Comfort, and he says that he has a circulation of three-quarters of a million—a paid circulation of voluntary subscribers who have sent in their subscription price—a paid circulation of 750,000; that he maintains an office in Boston where he pays $50,000 a year to his editors to write his paper. He says, further, that he has taken an oath for the Post-Office Department as to the extent of his circulation, and has sent it to the Department, so that the Department knows that this paper has a paid-for circulation of 750,000 copies. And if the Department is not satisfied with the evidence, it can rule the paper out. He says, also, that he pays the Government $2,000 a month out. He says, also, that he pays the Government $2,000 a month second-class postage.

And now I want to show why I do not believe this bill will make a net saving, but why, on the contrary, it will cost the Government more than the apparent saving of perhaps a million or two. This publisher says he pays the Government $2,000 a month for second-class postage. Remember that all these statements I am now quoting the Government may disprove if the facts enable it to do so. The gentleman from California can verify by the receipts at Angusta. Me. from this newspaper every statement that ceipts at Augusta, Me., from this newspaper every statement that

I now read to the House.

Mr. LOUD. I wish to ask the gentleman what are the correct figures as to the amount of postage this publisher pays monthly on second-class matter?

Mr. QUIGG. Comfort pays about $2,000 a month second-class postage.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman said $200,000 a month.

Mr. QUIGG. If so, that was a slip of the tongue.

Mr. LOUD. One of those unfortunate slips for which the gentleman has been criticising me so much.

Mr. QUIGG. This paper pays often more than $6,000 a month for first-class or letter postage. Now, the only thing that the publisher of Comfort does is to run a newspaper; that is all. He pays this sum for first-class postage as the result of the maintenance of a newspaper. He pays $2,000 a month to the Government to take his newspaper and spread it broadcast. He pays $6,000 to the Government for the stamps with which he conducts his correspondence with his patrons. He pays $2,000 more that is paid to the Government by the patrons of Comfort in first-class postage. And that does not include, of course, any of the money that comes to the Government in first, third, and fourth money that comes to the Government in first, third, and fourth class postage from those readers of Comfort who answer the advertisements—some 300 advertisements that that paper prints. Those advertisements cost the advertiser 50 cents a line of 9 words to the line. The advertiser does not advertise if it does not pay him to do so. Of course he advertises because he gets answers through the mails to his advertisements, and for every answer that comes to him the Government receives 2 cents in first-class postage. And that answer is an answer looking to some transaction with the advertiser; and if a transaction is had, the Government is liable to receive more as the result of its pound rate from its third and fourth class postage.

Now, all that business is wiped out when you wipe out the $2,000 receipts for second-class postage from Comfort. You save the Government the sum, whatever it is, which it costs to carry and handle Comfort's edition, but to do so you must lose at least $12,500. It does not look as though there could be a large net saving on that transaction.

The gentleman from California has readyou the names of a number of newspapers that approve this bill. He has had the indorsement of a newspaper association. I undertake to say that that newspaper association is not widely representative. It is entirely respectable, responsible, and excellent as far it goes. But you must understand that it is composed of daily newspapers, and daily newspapers are not the ones which this bill hits materially. It does hit them in denying the sample-copy privilege to some extent, but not materially. The daily newspaper is printed in cities where everybody knows of the publication and where it does not need to rely upon sample copies for increasing its circulation. Yet the New York Tribune, which opposes this bill, says that "it aims materially to increase the expense of every honest newspaper and every honest newsdealer in the United States.

The American Publishers' Association-

an organization useful to its own members, does not represent the Herald and the Tribune, two of the largest daily papers in New York City, and it only represents at the utmost iel out of a total of more than 1.890 daily newspapers published throughout the length and breadth of our country.

The sample-copy privilege is one on which all of the great weekly newspapers rely. It is of inestimable service to them. If it is cut off, if it is forbidden, the establishment of new periodical ventures is almost impossible if they seek for general circulation. Every great weekly throughout the land, such as the Independent, such as the Methodist Christian Advocate, such as the Youth's such as the Methodist Christian Advocate, such as the Youth's Companion, use this privilege constantly, and by using it vastly increase their business, and thereby vastly increase their payments to the Government in first, second, third, and fourth class postage.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is one of those penny-wise and pound-foolish schemes that continually issue from the class of mind which occupies itself with only one phase of a great question. I have upon my desk a great burden of petitions which I shall presently deliver to the House, from paper manufacturers, printers, binders, ink makers, pressmen, publishers, and news dealers, every one of whom sees in this proposition a distinct menace to his trade. There are features of the bill which I have not the time to discuss that are scarcely less serious than those to which I have been dithat are scarcely less serious than those to which I have been directed. One of these is the provision that the Postmaster-General must be satisfied, before he admits a paper to the second-class privileges, that its readers have voluntarily subscribed and voluntarily paid their subscription. To give to the Postmaster-General such far-reaching authority as that is to establish a press censorship the like of which does not exist in the Empire of the Czar or Sul-Another is the provision that news agents shall not be allowed to return to news agents or publishers unsold periodicals or publications except at the third-class rate. This provision repeals existing law, and would operate to drive thousands of news dealers out of employment and greatly to curtail the circulation of every weekly journal and monthly magazine. The bill abounds with crudities and absurdities that are conceived in deplorable ignorance of the ruinous results they would have upon established busines

The House ought not to pass this bill. The Government's policy, Mr. Chairman, of circulating periodical publications and books as well as newspapers at the lowest possible rate has been one of as well as newspapers at the lowest possible rate has been one of the most civilizing agencies that were ever employed for the up-building of a nation. It ranks in its beneficent effect upon our people next to the common-school system. It has brought into the poorest cottage in the country all the treasures of learning and infinite entertainment. To take the step which this bill contem-plates, without the slightest assurance of benefit to the Treasury, would be to deny to the people sources of pleasure and of informa-tion which are no less necessary than heneficent. [Amplanse]

tion which are no less necessary than beneficent. [Applause.]
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used one hour and seventeen minutes of the time.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HENDERSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on December 23, 1896, approved announced that the President had on December 23, 1896, approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 9473) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1898, and for other purposes; and

An act (H. R. 9753) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1897, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

The committee again resumed its session.

The committee again resumed its session.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE].

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, I would be perfectly safe, sir, in this contention, to take up this question where the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] left it, and in submitting the case to the House on that proposition—that is, the great educational features that are involved in the cheap rates of postage on second-class mail matter. I believe that I might accept the issue there, and go to this House on that proposition alone, and gain success for the mending hill.

But I shall not start, sir, to consume the few minutes of time allotted to me with this branch of discussion. I shall take up first the economic idea that is involved in it—the question as to whether there is a saving to the Government possible in the passage of this bill. Of course I must rely upon some one else for the information upon which I predicate my remarks, and I am not going to that class of our citizens who are interested financially in defeating this proposition, but I am going to those men whose duty it has been, as a part of this great Government of ours, to study this question and arrive, if possible, at a true and satisfactory solution of the question, with a view of attaining the best results for the greatest number of our fellow-citizens.

I will take Postmaster-General Wilson first, and, notwithstanding the gentleman's insinuations as to his ideas of propriety about the management of this great office and his declarations as to what he would do in case this House did not see proper to pass this bill, I will submit to the candid judgment of those who are doing me the credit to listen to me as to whether or not his statements do not bear upon their face the impress of reason and good sense. It has been his business to look into these matters, study them, and present them to this House, and no man upon this floor, I do not care what his politics or his prejudices may be, believes that Mr. Wilson would intentionally make a statement calculated to mislead.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Quigg], with all of his ingenuity and all of his antagonism to this bill, has utterly failed to demonstrate that Mr. Wilson has made an incorrect statement when he tells you in his report that the passage of a bill similar to this will result in a great saving to the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see what there is in this statement. Postmaster-General Wilson gives a summary of the business of the Post-Office Department, a statement of what it costs the Government to handle the postal business of the country. I shall call attention to the statements with reference to the income that the attention to the statements with reference to the income that the Post-Office Department receives from it:

First-class mail matter, both domestic and foreign -

That is the class of mail which includes our letters. The business interests of the country are concerned in this. I might say there is not a man, woman, or child from Maine to Texas who is not directly affected by the tax upon first-class mail matter. There are no classes about this. It is not the publisher of a serial library, or a newsdealer, or a newspaper man, or the publisher of a serial library, or a newsdealer, or a newspaper man, or the publisher of a periodical who is most directly concerned. There is no class especially interested in this, but the great body of the American people from the youngest to the greatest are interested. What is the statement with reference to this?

of first-class matter, both domestic and foreign, there was carried in the United States during the past fiscal year 65,337,343 pounds. What did the Government get for carrying that 65,000,000 pounds, in round numbers? It received something over $60,000,000 for carrying it. That is the item that reaches the home of every individual in the land.

We will next take second-class mail matter, the matter which is under discussion now, the matter which carries the serial libraries, these great educational pieces of machinery that the gentleman talks about; this class of our public service which disseminates books and disseminates information among our people, as the gentleman says. And I want to take occasion a little later to gentleman says. And I want to take occasion a little later to call your attention to the character of some of the information that is being distributed. Second-class mail matter mailed by publishers and agents, including free county matter, during the past fiscal year, 348,000,000 pounds. Three hundred and forty-eight million pounds of this stuff that is in the interest of the classes, against 65,000,000 pounds that is in the interest of the masses. against 65,000,000 pounds that is in the interest of the masses. For the carrying of the first the Government gets $60,000,000 a year, and for carrying the 348,000,000 pounds of second-class matter it gets, Mr. Chairman, $2,000,000 a year. I submit this to the good sense and good judgment of this House for a candid verdict upon this question, responsive to the issue here presented. Are not the masses here taxed to make lucrative the business of the publishers and dealers in this cheap literature?

Now, Mr. Chairman, we will go to third-class matter. Of that class the Government carried seventy-eight million and some odd pounds during the past year, and received for it $10,324,000. Of fourth-class mail matter, including parcels, etc., sent from foreign countries, the Government carried 19,000,000 pounds, in round without going into the discussion of these last classes, I desire simply to call your attention to the grave discrimination that exists here between first-class matter and second-class matter.

Oh, but the gentleman says, it is the great distributer of infor-

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him if there is any difference in the relative cost to the Government of carrying these different kinds—first, second, third, and fourth class matter

Mr. KYLE. Oh, I think there is, but I do not know what it is.

I am not able to give it.

Mr. LOUD. There is no difference in the cost of transportation.
Mr. KYLE. There is no difference in the transportation.
There must be a difference in the number of clerks, and so forth, costs as much to carry a pound of first-class matter as it does a pound of second-class matter.

Mr. KYLE. Certainly. The mail matter of the Government is weighed every four years, and the contracts are made based upon that weighing with the railroad companies.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was about to call attention to some of the information that is distributed, which my friend from New York

information that is distributed, which my friend from New York

Mr. COX. Distributed as second-class matter.

Mr. KYLE. Now, I hold in my hand some of these books which are now passing through the mails of this country as second-class matter, and I want to ask you, as I presume some of you, most of you, are fathers, if you would like the Government to put its you, are lathers, if you would like the Government to put its machinery into operation to convey to your boy a book bearing the title of this book which I show you, If the Devil Came to Chicago [laughter]—"Entered at the post-office at Chicago as second-class matter," and which is carried at 1 cent a pound, while good books bound pay 8 cents per pound, thus making it easier to obtain the trash than solid reading matter?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question there?

question there?

Mr. KYLE. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. How far do you think the devil would have to travel to get to Chicago?

Mr. KYLE. Well, sir, if you have a question you desire to ask, I will answer it, but will not reply to that which you have asked, with all due respect to you.

Mr. COX. He is there already.

Mr. KYLE. I want to call attention to another book. It is also entered as second-class mail matter. This is the kind of literature, gentlemen, that is being circulated as a part of the great educational system of this country, so to speak. It is known as The Seventh Commandment; and there are others here, such as Innocent Evils. I would like to exhibit some of these pictures to some of you gentlemen to show you something of the degrading stuff that passes through the mails at pound rates.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KYLE (continuing). And mind you, gentlemen, you are taxing all the postal business of this country; you are taxing all the commercial interests and the interest of every man, woman, and child that ever writes a letter to sustain this sort of an undertaking in this country.

Mr. OULIGG. Will the gentleman yield to me?

taking in this country.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. KYLE. Certainly, sir.

Mr. QUIGG. Of course the gentleman is familiar with the law that forbids the mail to any obscene and indecent literature?

Mr. KYLE. Yes, sir. These, I suppose, do not come quite to that point.

Mr. QUIGG. I desire simply to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that under the law it is just as much a violation of the law as it ever would be.

Mr. KYLE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have to hurry on; but I want to stop right here and advert to a statement that the gentleman from New York made during his speech when he was discussing this matter and talking about the law not authorizing such and such a thing—that the law did authorize the admission of these books as second-class mail matter. Now Mr. Chairman of these books as second-class mail matter. Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been said more than once that the way to get rid of a bad law was to enforce it. I respectfully submit to this House that the demonstration that this is a vicious law has been made by its execution. Now, I want to call attention here to what Mr. Wilson says about the cost of the transportation of this matter, and see if there is not a fair chance for the saving of some money and see if there is not a fair chance for the saving of some money to the Post-Office Department and to the people of this country. And the gentleman from New York has asserted to this House, if I understood him correctly, that there had been no increase in this matter, in the face of what the Postmaster-General says upon that proposition.

Mr. QUIGG. I hope the gentleman will not so misquote me.
Mr. KYLE. I beg the gentleman's pardon, and shall be glad to be corrected if I do.

Mr. QUIGG. I said that it had not increased inevitably from year to year; that there was a year—1894—that it did not increase over 1893; and I said that the expenses in that year did increase I admit, of course, that the figures are quite correct. I have said

I admit, of course, that the figures are quite correct. I have said

Mr. KYLE. Your point is that in one year it did not increase?

Mr. QUIGG. That was half of my point. My point was that in one year there was no increase, but in that year the expenses increased all along the line.

Mr. KYLE. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call attention to what the Postmaster-General has to say in respect to the increase of the weight of the second-class mail matter. For the year it was 37,000,000 pounds, against 13,000,000 last year, showing how this stuff is crowding into the mails. The mere cost of the transportation of this matter is estimated at 8 cents a pound. The Govern-Mr. RICHARDSON. But the question I want to ask is, if it ment, for transporting this wholesome literature, pays at the rate of 8 cents per pound for carrying it to its people; and what does it get in return for it? If the Postmaster-General is to be believed, the Government gets 8½ mills a pound for carrying, and pays out 8 cents for carrying. Why, if we do business enough of that sort in this country, it would not take us long to bankrupt the Treasury—paying at the rate of 8 cents a pound for distributing this stress and setting beats $1 mills a proved for it. I call attention stuff, and getting back 8½ mills a pound for it. I call attention to this fact—the report of not only Mr. Wilson, but Mr. Bissell and Mr. Wanamaker—that in their opinion, if it were not for this extra tax levied by this second-class matter, the postal service would be self-sustaining. As it is, we have an annual deficit of something over $8,000,000, which is to be made up from the tibraries" composed largely of such works as If the Devil Came to Chicago, and If Christ Came to Congress? [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I find that there are other things in the Postmaster-General's report that I would like to discuss, but which I shall have to pass over for want of time. I will, however, call attention to some more of these figures. The total amount of matattention to some more of these ngures. The total amount of matter is, in round numbers, 349,000,000 pounds, which, at 8 cents a pound for transportation, costs $27,920,000. The revenue received, at 8½ mills a pound, is $2,966,403, showing a loss on transportation alone of nearly $25,000,000. Now, what are you going to do with the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Quigg] that there is no loss from this source, and that there can not be a saving of the two millions, or of more than $1,000,000? Which are you going to accept, the statement of the gentleman from New York or the statement of the man whose official duty it is to inform himself about these questions, and who has the ability to be informed about them?

I call attention now to some statements made by Mr. Wana-maker upon this subject. It is not only Postmaster-General Wil-son who has been struggling to get rid of this wrong, this impol sition upon the people of this country, but also Postmaster-Genera-Wanamaker and Postmaster-General Bissell. All three of these Postmasters-General have been calling attention to this evil and appealing to Congress to relieve the Department of this wrong. I call it a wrong because I believe it is a wrong, and I believe that if I had time I could demonstrate that it is a wrong. Here is what Mr. Wanamaker says about the carrying of these cheap books and the discrimination that is made in their favor:

books and the discrimination that is made in their favor:

First. The enjoyment of the privilege of low postage by these paper-covered books works an injustice to the publishers of all other books. We all know that unnumbered thousands of books are issued every year in this country bound in cloth, leather, or some other substantial form of binding. There are also many books published with paper covers, the publishers of which make no pretense of issuing them as parts of a series or library of publications, they having the fairness to issue them under their true name—books. Now, why should there be any discrimination against these books, either bound or unbound? Why should they be taxed, for carriage by mail. I cent for every 2 ounces, while those that come under what are called the serial class go through for a cent a pound? There are, indeed, actual instances of the same book precisely, issued with paper covers, but by different publishers, in the one case charged but a cent a pound and in the other eight times that amount. These distinctions are manifestly absurd and unjust, and while they operate advantageously to one class of publishers they are harmful to another.

I say so, too. Why should there be any discrimination against

Why should there be any discrimination against I say so, too. books? And I want the man on this floor who is able to give a satisfactory answer to that inquiry of Mr. Wanamaker to do so. Why should there be a postal rate of 8 cents a pound upon a book with a cloth back while there is a charge of only 1 cent a pound on these paper-covered publications? Can any gentleman tell why? I pause for an answer. If there is any reason for discrimination, it is the other way. I believe the man who is trying to accumulate a library for himself and his family should be encouraged, rather than the fellow who is dealing in this cheap paper-back literature which is poisoning the youth of the land to-day. [Applause.] Mr. Wanamaker puts the question in such a way as to appeal to every man who opposes this bill to answer it, but no man has yet responded. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Quige] occupied the floor for an hour and a half this morning talking to this committee, and he doubtless has read Mr. Wanamaker's presentation of this question and has been impressed with the injustice and the inequality of the existing law, and he did not undertake to answer. Let me call attention now briefly to what Mr. Wanamaker said with reference to this class of literature: And I want the man on this floor who is able to give a sat-with reference to this class of literature:

There are many novels of that class which every librarian who has any regard for the morals of the community deplores the existence of, novels which depict, sometimes in the most seductive, sometimes in the most repulsive, aspects the decline and fall of woman—novels in which, where there is not a seduction there is an adultery, and where there is not an adultery there is a seduction, and very frequently there are both. Now, what kind of literature is that to bring into domestic circles, to be put forth by the thousand, and scattered all over your country, to the exclusion, or at least to the prejudice, of decent and elevating literature?

What kind of literature is that to bring into the domestic circle by these cheap rates of postage? The gentleman from New York [Mr. Quigg] has endeavored to impress this House with the idea that nearly everybody is opposed to this bill. Well, sir, I have been in Congress for six years and during that time have served upon the Post-Office Committee. Not a great many bills have emanated from that committee, but among those that have I have never known one in which so great an interest was manifested by the good people of the country as has been exhibited in favor of this bill. If you go into our committee room, you will see stacks of letters there from presidents of colleges, from preachers, from business men, from newspaper men, from every class of good citizens appealing to this Congress to pass this bill. I have some of those letters before me, but I have time to call attention to only one.

How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.
Mr. KYLE. In that time I desire to call attention to one letter signed by Governor Matthews, in which he says:

Aside from the possible saving to the Post-Office Department, the moral good accomplished, it is believed, would be of decided advantage to the public by the passage of the Loud bill, which is the pending bill.

I have another from Mr. David K. Goss, superintendent of schools, Indianapolis, in which he makes this appeal for the dear young people of our country. He says:

young people of our country. He says:

1 am sure that every school-teacher in the land will rejoice if Congress passes what is called the Loud bill, for one of its provisions is to deny the privilege of second-class rates to the publishers of dime novels and other questionable literature, an evil of monstrous proportions that should have been corrected many years ago. My interest in this bill is due entirely to my desire to see the Government dissolve partnership with the publishers of a class of publications that depends almost entirely upon the young for purchasers, and I speak advisedly when I declare that there is no more dangerous element in society to-day than the bad influence of the bad books of the class referred to, for they give the young incorrect and perverted ideas of life and its duties, and have turned many an honest boy into a criminal career who would otherwise have been a useful and respected citizen. While I doubt whether imposing a rate of 8 cents a pound on these publications will very seriously curtail their sales, still it will discontinue a perverted use of the mail system of the country and free it from its responsibility in affording aid in the circulation of a literature that appeals only to the baser instincts of human nature.

And I might go on and call attention to the fact that the American Press Association met in the city of New York and passed resolutions in favor of this bill. Not only that, but there is a newspaper association known as the Agricultural Press Association, which met in convention and indorsed this bill and appealed to Congress to pass it. The President of the United States has called the attention of Congress to it and suggested that some remedial legislation ought to be had. The Postmasters-General of the country have called attention to the evil and said that it ought to be stopped. And, gentlemen, where does the opposition to it come from?

Mr. LOUD. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. KYLE. Where does the opposition to this bill come from?

The American Trade Press Association says it is confined chiefly to those interested in the sale and distribution of such matter as I have been referring to, when the fact is that an overwhelming I have been referring to, when the fact is that an overwhelming majority of the newspapers which have expressed themselves on the subject are on record in favor of the proposed legislation. This association, says the opposition, comes first from the manufacturers of white paper; next, the printers of paper-covered novels; and third, those interested in the sale and distribution of such matter as paper-covered novels.

Mr. COX. Suppose the book the gentleman has exhibited here. which goes as second-class matter, and which I think is justly subject to his criticism, were bound in cloth, what postage would it pay?

Mr. KYLE. It would go at the rate of 8 cents a pound. Under the present system it goes at the pound rate.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not time, in the five minutes allowed Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not time, in the five minutes allowed me, to take up another branch of this discussion. I will simply call attention to the complaint made by the president of a Western university. He calls attention to the fact that these serial libraries, which we have been talking about, pass through the mails at the pound rate, while the publications emanating from his university, which are devoted to scientific subjects, can not pass through the mails except at a higher rate. Why? Because they do not get in under the law which requires that the publication shall appear periodically as many as four times a year, shall issue from a known place of publication, shall be numbered consecutively, etc. Yet, because these other men are willing to take advantage of the liberal opportunities afforded to publishers, while he is unwilling to eral opportunities afforded to publishers, while he is unwilling to do so, they may exercise a privilege which he or his institution can not. You may take this paper-covered book and send it to any part of this country at the pound rate; but if you take the Holy Scriptures or some religious tract and attempt to send it through scriptures or some religious tract and attempt to send it through the mails, you must pay the rate of 8 cents a pound. The wonder is, Mr. Chairman, as was remarked by the chairman of our com-mittee in presenting this proposition, that a long-suffering people have stood quietly by and permitted this wrong to exist without rising up and condemning it. [Applause.] [Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose: and Mr. Hepburn having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House

A bill (S. 3415) granting a pension to Ella D. Cross;

SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

The committee again resumed its session.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the passage of this bill because it will diminish the public expenditures, and because it will destroy a special privilege enjoyed by a few, for the existence of which no satisfactory reason can be given. It is unquestionably true that during past years when the revenues of the Government were abundant some national expenses have been incurred which will not bear the closest examination, and if no other benefit should result from the present condition of business depression and from these times when the expenses of the Govern-ment exceed its receipts, good may result from a closer scrutiny of public appropriations.

I wish to call attention, in the first instance, to the great oppor-tunity under our postal laws for extravagant expenditure and unjust discrimination, due to the fact that there are four classes of postal matter, carried according to widely different rates. Firstclass matter, including letters and postal cards, goes at 32 cents a pound; and in view of the fact that a maximum is fixed, and the weight of the package does not usually equal that maximum, the revenue to the Government from first-class matter is, according to official statistics, 93 cents per pound. Next in rate comes matto official statistics, 93 cents per pound. Next in rate comes matter known as fourth-class matter, comprising general merchandise of divers kinds in packages not exceeding 4 pounds in weight, for which there is a charge of 16 cents per pound. Next comes third-class matter, including, generally, bound books—seeds and bulbs have also been included—the rate being 8 cents a pound. Then for second-class matter, including newspapers and periodicals, the rate falls to 1 cent a pound. Thus we have this extraordinary range—from 32 cents per pound to 1 cent a pound. Yet for the carrying of all these different classes of pestal matter the railway and steampship companies charge precisely the same figure with and steampship companies charge precisely the same figure without distinction. And, indeed, Mr. Chairman, the danger of discrimination and extravagance does not cease here, for the Government carries the package indiscriminately to every place within the limits of the United States at the same price. If it charges a certain price to carry a letter or a package from one place to another within the limits of the same township, it charges no more to carry it 4,000 miles, or to far-off Alaska. But the railway and steamship companies, carrying the mails according to their ordinary rules as to rates, grade their charges according to the distance the package is carried.

So it will be observed that the very greatest care should be exercised in allowing to any class of mail matter any special privilege, because there is the gravest danger of discriminating and involving the Post-Office Department in extravagant expenditures.

The argument was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Quigo] that it does not make very much difference, even if the QUIGG] that it does not make very much difference, even if the tonnage carried as mail matter is greatly increased, because there is a diminishing scale of charges, and as the quantity increases there is a diminution of the rate paid for its carriage. Now, that suggestion, if it establishes anything, proves too much. It proves that we might as well carry as part of the work of the Post-Office Department express matter and freight to an unlimited weight. But there are two conclusive answers to the argument of the gentleman. In the first place, we have no guide to know what the transportation of mail matter of any kind will cost except the average price, which up to this time will be found to be 8 or 84.

average price, which up to this time will be found to be 8 or 81 cents a pound on every package. Second-class mail matter pays but 1 cent a pound; so that there is a manifest loss of 7 or 7½ cents a pound on every package of this class.

In the second place, when the weight of mail matter carried reaches a fixed amount, there is no decrease in rates on any quantity in excess of that. This fixed amount or maximum, as I now tity in excess of that. This fixed amount or maximum, as I now recollect it, is 5,000 pounds per day by any one route. Now, all the leading routes by which the bulk of second-class matter is carried haul a quantity far in excess of the maximum fixed, and would carry such excess if everything was excluded which this bill seeks to exclude. Consequently the cost of carrying any particular kind of mailable stuff, whether its admission to the mails tends to increase the aggregate quantity carried or not, does not fall materially below the average cost.

Now, what are the defects which have been found in the present

Now, what are the defects which have been found in the present postal system? First, I will say, the carrying of unbound books as periodicals. A sufficient reason why this practice should be discontinued is the incongruity and, I may say, the absurdity of its continuance. We all know what is meant by the word "periodical." It is a newspaper or publication having to do with current events or with subjects of present interest. It is not like a reprint, for example, of the works of Shakespeare or Dickens, but it is something which adds to the stock of literature already in existence. Nor is it presently a publication of that sensational class. ence. Nor is it properly a publication of that sensational class issued by many of the book-publishing establishments of the country

A few specimens selected at random from the titles of some of A few specimens selected at random from the littles of some of these so-called periodicals which are circulated as second-class matter at this cheap rate will enable us to judge exactly what they are. Among them we find Diamond Dick's Ride for Life. That is one of the "educational documents" which our friends say should be sent throughout the country. Diamond Dick's Pat Hand, The Black Mogul, Gentleman Joe in Pittsburg, The James Boys and the President's Special, and books of like character; and here is one author who has a taste for alliteration, Cool

Chris, the Crystal Sport, and so on.

But it is hardly necessary to quote titles to show the character of these books. The inevitable tendency among publishers who enjoy this doubtful privilege, and who, under an unnatural construction of the law, are enabled to transact business in this unusurable to the construction of the law, are enabled to transact business in this unusurable to the construction of the law, are enabled to transact business in this unusurable to the construction of the law, are enabled to transact business in this unusurable to the construction of the law, are enabled to transact business in this unusurable to the construction of the law, are enabled to transact business in this unusurable to the construction of the law, are enabled to transact business.

struction of the law, are enabled to transact business in this independent must be to send out books of a lower grade.

The argument has also been made that the so-called return privilege should continue. Everyone knows what that is. A hundred copies of a magazine are sent out to a news dealer. The news dealer sells, say, 10 copies. Under the present law he may send back to a news agent, who is practically the publisher himself, the other 90 copies at a cent a pound, although it costs the Government 8 cents a pound. Now, for this, I submit, there is no justification. There may be an excuse for a low rate on what the people do read, but is there any justification for these low rates on those period-but is there any justification for these low rates on those periodicals which the people do not read?

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for one moment for information?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. COX. When they send out these periodicals to news dealers and a number are sold, is there anything in the law prohibiting the sending of those numbers out again at the same rate?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I fancy not.

Mr. COX. They send them back again?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Those which are not sold can be sent elsewhere.

elsewhere.

Mr. COX. They send them out again?
Mr. BURTON of Ohio. They could do so.
Mr. COX. They go out hunting a market, then, in which to sell them? They may send them back to the same place?

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. It would be a violation of the spirit of the law to send them back to the same place, but there is certainly no prohibition on their going elsewhere.

A crucial test as to whether this Government ought to continue these low rates is to ask yourselves whether we would be willing to pass a bill for the printing gratis of these different kinds of matter going as second-class periodicals. A publisher who strongly opposes the passage of this bill says:

A very important fact, which should not be lost sight of, is that in very many cases the publishers do not receive from consumers more than 10 cents per pound for this literature.

Yet this literature, counting the cost for handling, which should be added to the cost for transportation, costs the people of the United States, according to reliable estimates, 14 cents a pound, and it would be cheaper for this Government, at its own Printing Office or by private contract, to print these so-called periodicals for 10 cents a pound and give them away than it is to give them access to the mails under the present system. I do not believe a bill proposing the printing of this material gratis by the Government would have a dozen votes, and perhaps not one, in this

Passing to the next great abuse under the present system. It is that of the sample copy. Now, I do not believe we will any of us object to the sample copy, if restricted to its proper use, for which it was originally intended, namely, that of sending out copies of bona fide publications, so that persons may judge of their merit and decide whether to subscribe or not. But the trouble is an abuse has grown up from this system which can not trouble is an abuse has grown up from this system which can not be separated from its legitimate use. One single periodical sends out monthly, under the sample-copy privilege, 1,250,000 copies. It is not a newspaper. It is a travesty to call it such. There are many similar sheets. It appears from the report of the Postmaster-General that the increase during six years in master-General that the increase during six years in newspapers entered for circulation at the post-office as second-class matter was 24,304, but the actual number of periodicals which during that time obtained standing in the newspaper directory was 3,747. So, as Postmaster-General Bissell stated, only 15 per cent of those included under the designation of second-class matter were legiti-mate newspaper publications.

These go in enormous quantities. They are a cheap advertising medium. They are sent indiscriminately over the country. Advertisers, realizing the fact that they go in the mail almost for nothing, and are scattered far and wide, are willing to pay large prices for the privilege of advertising in their columns. And right here I wish to pay attention to the leading argument made in favor of this sample-copy privilege. It is claimed that while these copies are carried at a loss to the Government, yet the Government makes up for the loss in other ways. It is said that letters come to the publisher of the sample copy. He offers prizes. All of which stimulates the post-office business. To that a sufficient answer is, that there is just so much money that the people of this country have to spend. There is just so much business they can transact, and they will transact just as much business, write just as many letters, and pay attention to a great deal better class of advertisements, if this business of advertising is restricted to the legitimate newspaper and the ordinary way of doing business. Indeed, there will be an improvement, because with the greater responsibility and degree of care which must be exercised by the regular newspaper in regard to matter in its col-umns, there will be a higher standard, and money will be invested

Now, Mr. Chairman, some other objections are made to the passage of this bill. One which I see stated is that it will prevent the sending of newspapers after the expiration of a term of subscription, because the bill describes a subscriber to a paper as one who "voluntarily orders and pays for the same." That clearly is not a correct interpretation of the proposed law. It has been decided by the Post-Office Department, according to my under decided by the Post-Office Department, according to my understanding, that a subscriber who receives a paper after the expirastanding, that a subscriber who receives a paper after the expiration of his term of subscription is voluntarily receiving that periodical. Until he comes to the post-office and states that he wishes it no longer, he is counted a subscriber. So there is no objection to this law in that regard. But in any event there can be no objection made to the phraseology used, for no one wishes to subscribe for a newspaper unless he does so voluntarily.

Now, as to the statement that the passage of this bill will throw out of employment hundreds and thousands of people. There is always such an appeal made in such cases. Then, too, the claim is made that the people will be deprived of good reading. They always such an appeal made in such cases. Then, too, the is made that the people will be deprived of good reading. may exercise more discrimination, but they will have just as good reading. I do not believe that the number of publications, the amount of printing, the number of men employed, will be at all diminished under the proposed law. The present method is not a diminished under the proposed law. The present method is not a rational way to do business; and when we shut off these objectionable classes of matter, we will be better off by reason of this reform, and we will be more prosperous than under the present régime.

One word in conclusion. It must be very clear to everyone familiar with the course of things in this House that there is always a certain degree of inertia in the way of legislation. Wrongs may go unrighted, salutary reforms may not be adopted, avenues may be pointed out for increase in individual and national prosperity which are not taken advantage of because of the hesitancy of this body to act; but let a measure be presented for consideration that strikes at some special privilege, and we are, as it were, contending with an army intrenched for battle. The cry of "Injury to the people" is made, and it would seem from some of the arguments employed as if a great wrong were to be done. If the public expenditures are to be diminished and reform is to be accomplished, I do not believe this House can do better than to pass this bill. If it becomes a law, this branch of the public service will be more economically conducted and it will be more just for all. [Loud applause.] for all. [Loud applause.]

Mr. QUIGG. How much time does the gentleman from California desire?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Not a very large amount—twenty or twenty-five minutes.

or twenty-new minutes.

Mr. QUIGG. I have no desire to limit the gentleman. I yield half an hour to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, there is an old adage that "fools rush in where angels fear to tread." I presume that will be exemplified in my case when I attempt to take some that will be and most those centlemen on the opposite side. part in this debate and meet those gentlemen on the opposite side whose many years' study of the question have doubtless enabled them to know all about it.

Now, I may misunderstand the importance of this question. may be that I have a misunderstanding about the language of the gentleman from California, the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in his opening remarks on this mat-ter. But if I correctly understood him, he stated that this was one of the most important—if not the most important—bills that would come before Congress. As I listened to his remarks I understood him to say that there would be a saving of at least $40,000,000 to the United States if this bill, his pet measure, should pass. If that be true, what is the use of having tariff debates? What is the use of having hearings before the Conmittee on Ways and Means? What is the use of our doing anything on earth except to pass this bill, thus giving an increase of revenue and stopping all the defi-ciency, and thus ending all this talk that has been going on amongst the people of the United States in regard to deficiencies in the revenue?

Why, according to this Daniel who has come to judgment (I am proud the State of California has produced such a Daniel, who has given us such a judgment, if he can back it up)—according to him, all on earth that this suffering nation—which he says is suffering now—that this nation, which is now running behind, and which he said so many times on the stump—that this nation that is going to the "demnition bow wows," as my learned friends on the left, who represent the Populist party, said so frequently during the campaign—if this nation is going to this damnation and ruin, financially and otherwise, because we can not pay our debts as they come due, why on earth do we not take this measure that the learned gentleman from California has offered us, and, by simply passing a little innocent bill of this kind, to amend the postal laws of the country, stop all this discussion? [Laughter.] As I listened to his remarks, and as I read them [Laughter.] As I listened to his remarks, and as I read them afterwards, it seemed to me that we could express the situation in doggerel, and we might-

Let DINGLEY and REED, McKinley and Hanna about tariff worry no more; Let Bryan and free silver together lie in the tomb; Let the Ways and Means Committee shut, lock, and bolt their door, And give Loup and his postal scheme lots and lots of room.

Great laughter. If the gentleman's ideas are correct and are carried out, all that is needed is to pass this bill and save $240,000,000 to the people in the next ten years, thus ending the deficiency in our Treasury and giving us prosperity without any increase of our tariff.

Why, the golden sands of Pactolus' stream are as nothing compared to the wealth that will come to the United States if we only pass this bill. Golconda's mountains themselves shrink into utter insignificance compared to the wealth that, according to the gentleman from California, will pour into our coffers if we only pass this bill. [Laughter.] Why, sir, all that will be necessary will be for the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States under the incoming Administration, whoever he may be, whether he be the leader of this House, whom we all honor and respect and esteem, and in whose behalf every man here, Republican, Democrat, Populist, all alike, would sign a petition to have him made Secretary of the Treasury—whether it be Nelson Dingley, or whether it be that leader of men who my learned friends on my whether it be that leader of men who my learned friends on my left seem to think is composed in equal parts of alligator, horse, and fighting man, because he led the battle in favor of the Republican party in the last campaign and led it to success—Mark Hanna, of Ohio; whether the next Secretary of the Treasury be either of these gentlemen, or whoever he may be, all that he will have to do if this bill passes will be to walk over to the Postmaster-General and say, "My dear sir, please exert a little of your authority upon the postal revenues and replenish our depleted Treasury and thus enable us to pay our bills when they become due." Now, Mr. Chairman, we all know that the talk of this kind indulged in by the gentleman from California is nonsense. [Laughter.] It is mere flapdoodle, such as is fit only to be doled out to fools and idiots. [Laughter.] It ought not to be presented to the members of this House. It does not appeal to us in any way except to our sense of the ridiculous. The idea that this bill will save two hundred and forty millions for the next ten years! Why, Aladdin and his wonderful lamp are as nothing to my colleague from California. He proposes to rub his brush upon the postal revenues and, lo, the genii of wealth will appear, and it will be at once poured into the Treasury. [Laughter.] Pshaw! What kind of an argument is that to present to this House? And yet that is the gentleman's statement. The learned gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Burton], a gentleman whom I esteem and revere as a lawyer and whom I believe to be honest in this regard—the learned gentleman from Ohio says that there are objections to this bill, and he asks those who are opposed to it to maintain their objections to it. Is that the manner in which the gentleman argues a case in court when he is for the plaintiff? I have always understood, in my brief life and with my feeble understanding, that those who suggest a change are required to give the reasons for the change, instead of calling upon their adversaries to maintain a negative.

If there is any good in this proposed new law, if there is any necessity for it, show us, oh statesman from Cleveland, who has basked in the smiles of Chairman Hanna [great laughter]—show us wherein the necessity or the advantage lies. I say to you that it is absolutely necessary that reasons should be given why we should make a change in the postal law, and you are bound to give them, and not to call upon us poor devils who are satisfied with the existing law to give reasons why there should be no change. Do not ask us to prove a negative, but give us the reasons why a change should be made. We are like the man who was thrown from his horse, with a colt right behind it, into the midst of the river, and as he rose to the surface he grabbed, as a drowning man will do, at the first thing that came within his reach, which happened to be the colt's tail, and as the colt was feebly endeavoring to carry himself and his master ashore the people on the bank shouted to the man, "Let go the colt and take hold of the mare." But he said, "Good God! I've got hold of something now, and I think I had better not change until I get ashore." [Laughter.] So it is with us, Mr. Chairman; we have got hold of something good now, and we do not want to let go what we have and attempt to take something new unless those who propose the change can show good reasons for it. [Laughter.]

"But,"say both the gentlemen who have preceded me, the gen-

"But, say both the gentlemen who have preceded me, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE], who follows in the wake of the chairman of the committee, and my learned friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], "bad books go through the mails." Now, that is a wonderful discovery! [Laughter.] Just think of it! There are bad books going through the United States mails! Who ever heard of that before? And myfriend from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] has at last awakened to the fact that a book has been published called, If Christ Came to Congress. [Laughter.] He has been here six years, and he never knew of that before. Now, if my friend would only subscribe to some of these publications that he denounces, if he had subscribed, for instance, to the Howard Publishing Company, he would have found that out long ago, and if he had been a devout member of Congress he would have discovered that Christ comes to Congress, as he comes to every other place, regardless of the title of that novel. [Laughter.] These gentlemen say that bad books go through the mails, and they read you the titles of some of them, Jibbering Jack or Patsy McGallahan, or other fancy names like these, and they say that these books are going to injure the people.

are going to injure the people.

Just think of it, gentlemen! In the report presented by the committee they quote from that good man, that man whom I have heard the leaders of the party of the gentleman from Mississippi denounce, or rather I have read their speeches wherein they denounced him as a man who had bought a seat in the Cabinet for $400,000; yet now this committee and my friend from Mississippi quote Postmaster-General Wanamaker to show that we ought to vote for this bill. [Laughter.] I congratulate the gentleman from Mississippi on his conversion to the goodness of Wanamaker. [Laughter.] They tell us that bad books go through the mails, Admitting that bad books go through the mails, are there not good books also going through the mails? I have one here now—Jane Eyre, by Charlotte Bronté—that has been handed to me by a gentleman who is opposed to this bill. I read that book forty or fifty years ago—I hate to think how old I am [laughter]—and I thought it was a good book then, and I think it is a good book now. That book goes through the mails, and I venture the assertion that for every bad book that the chairman of the committee, my colleague from California, can hold up before this House as a specimen of bad literature going through the mails, we can show at least ten good books that go through the mails.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am nothing but a poor backwoods country lawyer, yet I have learned in the few years that I have practiced law in the small towns and villages of California that you may pass any number of laws that you choose in regard to crime and yet you never can prevent crime. You can punish crime; you can make men perhaps think twice before they commit it, because of the punishment which they will receive. But you can not prevent crime. No more can you prevent the sending of bad books through the mail. I venture the assertion that bad books were sent through the mail before the era of this Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I venture to assert that bad books were sent through the mail long before any agitation had been engendered in the United States for a change of the postal laws. Bad books will go through the mails forever and ever.

I am old enough to remember when there was a crusade against other books going through the mails; and I have read books—I dislike to admit it, because perhaps it will be said by men who favor this bill that I am not a good judge of books—but I have read books by Fielding and by Smollett that now, under the new order of things, would not be allowed to be sent through the mails—at least, objection would be made. Yet those works rank among the classics of England. Men's minds change, and they may change in reference to books as well as other things.

But there are good books going through the mails. Literature may change in reference to books as well as other things.

But there are good books going through the mails. Literature is being disseminated cheaply. I dissent entirely from the view of my learned friend from Ohio as to the reprinting of old books. I say for one that, in my judgment, the reprinting of the English classics, the reprinting of the works of Bulwer, and Diekens, and Scott, and the sending of such books through the mails at reduced prices, so that the poor people may read them, is not an evil, but a great good to the results.

I beg pardon for speaking of "the people" or for intimating that they ought to receive any consideration at the hands of the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud], because in the next House I shall not be permitted to speak of "the people;" and when I speak of them now it is through a lapsus linguæ, because it is true, as the gentleman so kindly informed the House, that I shall not be in the next House. More is the pity for the next House. [Laughter.] But at the same time I am a member of the present House; and inasmuch as I am one of the people, I may be pardoned for saying again that I believe you can not bring those English classics too close to the people nor make them too cheap. And when you can buy a set of the works of Charles Dickens for 25 cents or less per volume by reason of the operation of the present postal laws of the United States, I say the good that will be done to the people of this country by reason of their being able to purchase the works of Dickens at such a price outweighs all the damage that may be done to any of the people by the dissemination of all the bad books, they will get them; if they want to read vicious literature, they will read it; and you can not pass laws which will prevent it.

Why, sir, I have sometimes heard talk against sumptuary laws.

Why, sir, I have sometimes heard talk against sumptuary laws. I have heard gentlemen—Republicans, Democrats, and Populists alike—animadvert at length upon sumptuary laws, contending that no such laws should be passed; that the people ought to be allowed in such matters to do as they please. Yet here we are called upon, it seems to me, to enact sumptuary legislation. We are called upon here to protect the people against themselves—to protect them against having literature sent to them that may debauch and injure them. I have faith in the plain people of the land. I have faith that they will not be injured by the literature which may be sent out under present laws. So it seems to me that the argument urged in favor of this bill, that we should prevent the dissemination of bad books, falls to the ground. The dissemination of bad books will continue, because wherever there is a demand for bad books there will be a supply. But it seems to me that the dissemination of good books under such legislation as is proposed here may largely be interfered with, because to get good books costs money; and in order to have them furnished to the people at cheap rates we must continue to give the publishers of these books the same privileges that they now enjoy. But the real reason for this bill—the real object of the bill, I may say, or the real argument which gentlemen have offered in its favor—is furnished by the report made by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads itself; and for the information of the committee, if I may be permitted, I will read from that very report to show you why I make that remark. On page 3 of the report I find this language:

There is much maudlin sentiment among many of our people about the Post-Office Department. Many compare it with the war and naval establishments and say it should not be run for profit or even to pay expense of operation, but should be supported by taxation and run in the interest of and for the people. To our mind, however, there is no comparison; the one is for the defense of the nation as a whole; no one individual needs their protecting arm more than another, and all are taxed according to their means for its support. The Post-Office Department is an accommodation to the great mass of our people, but not an absolute necessity; private means could as well, or better, be adapted to the transmission of our mails, and, in the opinion of the writer of this report—and that opinion is formed after many years of practical and theoretical experience in postal affairs—could be so done much more cheaply, with quicker dispatch and better satisfaction to the people.

There is the meat of the whole thing. There is the occasion for this bill. It is an insidious attack on the Post-Office Department of the country. It is the beginning of the agitation that you shall take the post-office from the nation and put it into the hands of private individuals. And I congratulate the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that they have the courage to avow their desire to put into private hands that which I for one deem should be left for all time in the hands of the National Govern-

Mr. Chairman, I read that report of the committee, and I read it carefully, and when I found that sentence in it I read it over two or three times, and became convinced that it was my duty, and it was the duty of every member of this House, to vote against the bill if he believes in the United States Government managing the post-office; if he believes in the United States carrying on the communication between its own critizens in an of this broad land. If you are in favor of taking the Post-Office Department from the National Government and giving it into the hands of private individuals, all right; vote for the bill. If, ing on the communication between its own citizens in all parts the hands of private individuals, all right; vote for the bill. If, on the contrary, you are in favor of keeping the post-office in the hands of the nation, then vote against it.

For one I believe in the Post-Office Department. I believe it ought to be kept in the hands of the National Government. I believe it to be an advantage to the nation-to the advantage of all of our people. I disagree entirely with the report of the committee. I believe, in opposition to the report, that the Post-Office Department is an absolute necessity to the people, and that the business can be better conducted through the Department than in any other possible way. So believing, Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against this bill. I believe it to be wrong in principle and wrong in practice to admit at this time, at this age, and in this genera-tion that such a change should be made. I am opposed to put-ting the opening wedge into legislation which will serve to sever the Post-Office Department from the fostering care and protecting arm and supervision and control of the United States Government. So long as our Post-Office Department is conducted by the United States, it will do well. The moment we put it in the hands of private individuals trouble ensues—trouble to the writer and trouble to the receiver of the letter. Trouble on all hands will follow. Therefore, that reason alone ought to be sufficient, it seems to me, to justify any member in voting against the passage of such a bill as this. We must vote against it unless some strong reason, unless, indeed, potent reasons shall arise and be stated, other than were told about bad books going through the mails, for its support.

My friend from Colorado, a Bell that usually sounds true when struck in the interest of the people, even though a Populist, has handed me a memorandum and called my attention to the fact that the law now prohibits the sending through the mails of vicious literature, some of that class presented by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Kyle]. It is even now denied the right of passage through the mails. I frankly confess that I am not as familiar with the law as I ought to be. I frankly confess that I presume the chairman of the committee and the committee itself know, or at least think they do, very much more about the matter than I do, and they have said that the law in this report was suf-ficient at the present time. On page 4 of their own report they claim it is sufficient now. But inasmuch as that information emanated from that committee, I was afraid I ought to take it in a Pickwickian sense, and understand that they meant something a little different from what they did say in their report, because I can not conceive that any set of men would come into the House, and in one breath say that the law ought to be amended in order to prevent the sending through the mails of vicious books and literature of that character, and in the next breath declare that the law was sufficient as it is now to prevent the very thing that they ask to have prevented. But if it be true that the law does prevent it as at present constituted, and my friend from Colorado says it does—if that is true (and I dilute the security of the statement; I weaken, in other words, the citation, and do not strengthen the precedent when I say that even the committee's report indorses the proposition of the gentleman from Colorado) [laughter]; if it be true that the present law is sufficient, and that under it the vicious publications, the literature of this class, is denied transmission through the mails, in the name of common sense why do you want to change it? [Laughter.]

Is it because of this great deficiency in the revenue? Is it because of the $8,000,000 per year that they say this Post-Office Department costs? For one, I think the Post-Office Department should be carried on whether it makes money or loses money. I do not care a snap of my finger whether it costs the Government $185 to send a letter to Alaska, as the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] intimated. If we have a United States citizen living in Alaska under the protection of the Stars and Stripes, and there is a post-office there, it is the duty of this Government to send his mail to Alaska, even if it costs $185 per letter to send it. I do not believe in this making fish of one and flesh of the other. I agree with my learned friend from Ohio [Mr. Burton] that there should be no privileged classes, and that is why I am opposed to this bill.

this bill.

They say that certain trade press associations have declared in favor of this bill. Why? Because it benefits them. Who have declared against it? Nearly every country newspaper in the United States of America; every cheap magazine in the United States. Where can you find better magazines than Munsey's, McClure's, the Cosmopolitan, and others that I might name, that are sold now for a dollar a year or 10 cents a copy, and which are enabled to be sold at that cheap rate because of the privilege given to them by the present liberal postal laws. I am not familiar with the facts connected with their circulation, but I understand that it increased from a few thousand to over a million by reason of the it increased from a few thousand to over a million by reason of the liberal operation of the postal laws. Why cut them off? Does any member of the Post-Office Committee think that those magazines are vicious literature? Does he think that the people ought to be deprived of the right to read those magazines simply because they are cheap? I do not know how the great newspapers of New York stand upon this question. I do know how one newspaper stands upon it; that is the New York Tribune. A friend has sent me a copy of it; and in the New York Tribune I have found editorial after editorial against this bill, urging Congress to defeat it. I do not speak of that as a matter that should have much weight with the members of this House. I regard it as a fatal confession of weakness on the part of the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud], the chairman of this committee, and of his colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Kyle], when they undertake to say that the newspapers favor it. Who and what are the newspapers of this land that they should dictate legislation to Congress? Who and what are the newspapers that they should say a law is good or a law is bad, and we should blindly accept their directions? There is not a member of Congress, always excepting the chair-man of the Post-Office Committee, but what has been abused by the newspapers, and when you were abused by them did you think that they were the ones entitled to tell you how to vote? [Laughter.]

It seems to me that every measure should stand upon its own merits, and we should discuss it regardless of what the newspapers say, whether they affirm or deny its goodness, whether they affirm or deny its wickedness; and, furthermore, that in deciding whether we shall support this bill we should ask ourselves, Have any reasons been assigned to justify us in changing the law? only reasons given, and they can be summarized, are three: First, that bad books go through the mails.

That amounts to nothing.

Second, that there is expense attending it.

That, as it seems to me, amounts to nothing, because of the good results

And third, that we would save $40,000,000 a year.
That I have, I think, already shown to be a chimera of the imagi-

Now, what is left of the bill? Why should we pass it? They say Postmasters-General have recommended the bill. They say that a Democratic Postmaster-General and a Republican Post-master-General have recommended it. When and where did it become the law that the mere recommendation of a Cabinet officer entitled a bill to be passed through Congress? I do not know. Of course I am a new member of Congress. I have been here only one term, and owing to some mysterious dispensation of Divine Providence, for which He knows the reason and I do not, I shall not be here again. [Laughter.] In the short time that I have been here I never have yet found it the law or the rule that because a Cabinet officer recommended a bill, therefore it should necessarily pass.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SHERMAN) raised the gavel.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Oh, now, don't do that, Uncle

ames! [Laughter.] The CHAIRMAN. James!

The Chair regrets to say that the time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If that be true, I suppose "the gentleman from California" must expire, unless my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. Quige] will give me a few minutes more

Mr. QUIGG. How much time does the gentleman from California desire?
Mr. JOHNSON of California. Well, about five minutes more,

I think.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.
Mr. JOHNSON of California. For what I have received I am thankful. For what I shall receive I will be thankful. [Laugh-

Now, as I was saying, why should we pass this bill? Usually there is a demand for legislation found in the operation of the law in existence. Usually that demand for legislation can be succinctly presented to Congress by the advocates of the measure. We are not usually required to arise and say, "These are the objections to the bill," and receive answer to those objections. The wise man in presenting a case, when he is either a lover or a lawyer, speaks of the good results to flow from the marriage or from the verdict. But here it is reversed, and we find gentlemen saying there are certain evils which now exist in our imagination because we object to the bill. They say our objections are of no force. Let them show first wherein the law works badly. Let them go further. They merely speak of the titles of various books. Far be it from me to even intimate that the grave, sedate, and learned gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] has ever read any of these books the titles of which he has called to our attention! [Laughter.]

attention! [Laughter.]
I know that the operation of his mind is so quick and the X-rays that scintillate from his intellect are so penetrating he is able to tell by a look at a book, on reading its title, whether it is a good or a bad book! Therefore he may be pardoned for saying all these or a bad book! are bad books. But "upon what meat hath this our Cæsar" from Mississippi "fed" [laughter] that he is also able to tell that these are bad books? Andmy kind friend from Ohio [Mr. Burton], have you read these books? [Laughter.] Is it possible that you have? I shrink from the thought that you have read these books. [Great

Now, the title of a book in itself amounts to nothing. One of the pleasantest books that any man here remembers is The Dam-nation of Theron Wade. I presume the gentleman from New York [Mr. Quige] has read it if anyone else has, and I presume a great many have read it. The title of that book would make us antagonize it; and yet it is interesting, it is eloquent and instructive. The title of the book itself is not sufficient to condemn it. I admit that the title of the book If Christ Came to Congress condemns that the title of the book it christ came to congress condemns that book without reading it; and it ought to be condenned. [Laughter.] I admit that if we could pass a law to keep that book and its sequel, which has been advertised, out of the mails, that we would be doing right to pass it, even if we had to do bodily violence to the gentleman the reputed author of the

But the question is as to whether the title of a book itself makes it bad. I do not think it does. The title of a book of itself does not make it bad. You must have waded through these books. Just think of it, gentlemen of the House of Representatives—just think of what the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has suffered in behalf of the dear people, whom he loves! He has waded through hundreds and hundreds and thousands of these bad books in order that he might be able to tell you that they were bad, and in order that you might vote for this bill to they were bad, and in order that you might vote for this bill to prevent others from suffering. It reminds me of a story of cholera times in New York, when the doctor said, "You must not eat green-apple or rhubarb pie;" and when the man of the house came in one day and found a rhubarb pie, made in the good old-fashioned style—and it makes my mouth water to think of it—he asked what it was, and when his wife told him he said, "Good God! wife, in these cholera times, are you going to permit our dear, loved children to eat that rhubarb pie and die of cholera? No, no: take it away; put it in the pantry; keep it there." And they did so; and that evening, after the children had retired, true to his duty as a father, true to his duty as an American citizen. to his duty as a father, true to his duty as an American citizen, he went into the pantry, where that pie was, and to save the lives of his innocent children ate that pie himself. [Great laughter.]

And so to-day, Mr. Chairman, the learned chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has read all these bad books to prove to us the necessity of passing this bill in order that we might be saved from evil by his vicarious punishment. [Great

laughter.

Mr. LOUD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missis-

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, I understood from the remarks of the gentleman from California.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, I understood from the remarks of the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Which one?

Mr. KYLE. Mr. JOHNSON. (Continuing.) That he stated that he had read some speech of mine, where I charged Mr. Wanamaker with having paid $400,000 for a seat in the Cabinet.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the gentleman so understood me, or if I said so, that was an error. I presumed that he, like other Democrats, believed that. Of course, what a man intends to say and what he does say is frequently very different. [Great] same satisfaction that I presume a visitor to St. Louis did the day after the cyclone. I am glad I did not come before the gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson], and that I have the privilege of talking after him, so that I may have missed the cyclone with which he struck the other gentlemen on our side of this question.

Now, I do not know what the particular relations are between the two distinguished gentlemen from California. The thinly veiled sarcasm of the last gentleman in his attack upon the bill would indicate that in order to have a consolidated and a united Republican party in the State of California the two gentlemen should get together. They have been accusing us in Ohio of being divided. I think that the Republican party in California, if the remarks of the gentleman who has just concluded are any index of the situation, ought to get together and harmonize their differences.

Now, so far as any covert attack upon the chairman of the committee is concerned, I propose to make no defense, because I take it for granted that he is fully able to take care of himself; but so far as the attack made upon this bill is directed against the Post-Office Committee, of which I am a member, I propose to try,

Post-Office Committee, of which I am a member, I propose to try, in my feeble way, to reply to some of the comments and criticisms that have been made, not only by the learned gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson], but by the gentleman from New York [Mr. Quigg] who preceded him.

To begin with, and for fear that I should overlook it, the gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson], referring to page 3 of the report, quoted the language of the chairman of the committee, in which he says it is his opinion, formed after many years of practical and theoretical experience in postal affairs, that the transmission of the mails could be done more cheaply and with quicker dispatch and better satisfaction by private means then by the posts. dispatch and better satisfaction by private means than by the postoffice authorities, and the gentleman seemed to think that he had discovered in that statement the colored individual in the wood pile so far as this bill is concerned.

pile so far as this bill is concerned.

Upon that ground the gentleman charged the committee with undertaking to break down the Post-Office Department by bringing in and urging the passage of this bill. The gentleman appeared to think that we were engaged in an insidious attack upon the Post-Office Department in attempting to save for it an amount which has been variously estimated at from one to ten million dollars per annum, or even a larger sum. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from California must be entirely unfamiliar with the history of the legislation that is proposed in this bill. He must be entirely unaware of the fact that from 1879 down to the present time there has been hardly a report made by any Postmaster-General of the United States, Republican or Democrat, which has not called attention to the evils which this bill attempts to correct, or has not made recommendations for their correction. If, therefore, the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, and the members of that committee, who have adopted this report, are engaged in an insidious attack upon the Department, equally guilty are Postmasters-General Wanamaker, Bissell, and the present Postmaster-General, Wilson.

Again, the gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson] says that we come here with our bill occupying a negative position, that we say in effect, "Prove that our bill is not a good bill," and that we do not rely upon the positive merits of the bill itself. In other we do not rely upon the positive merits of the bill itself. In other words, to use the gentleman's own illustration, according to him we come into court and say, "Here is our complaint; now let the defense prove that our allegations are not true." If the gentleman were aware, as he probably is not aware, of the hundreds and thousands of letters that have been mailed to the Post-Office Committee since the introduction of this bill, urging its passage, letters from business men, from the public press all over the country, even from the weekly newspapers which are supposed to be most injuriously affected by the bill—if the gentleman could have seen and read those communications, he would never have asked, "What is the demand for this bill?" The demand, sir, is universal. It comes from all classes of people and from all sections of the country. The bill is indorsed not only by the business men, the manufacturers, and others who by reason of frauds upon the postal service under the present law are comfrauds upon the postal service under the present law are compelled to pay more than their just proportion in the other grades of postage, but the indorsement cones also from the publishers of newspapers themselves, who, if any class are to be affected injuriously by the withdrawal of the privilege of sending sample

Mr. GUIGG. Will the gentleman—

Mr. BROMWELL. I decline to be interrupted.

The gentleman from New York in his statement that every measure of this kind which had been brought before Congress had Mr. KYLE. I accept the explanation. It is all satisfactory to me.

Mr. LOUD. I yield forty-five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bromwell].

Mr. Bromwell].

Mr. Chairman, I feel a great deal of the many see the action which was taken at that time upon that bill I will occupy a moment in referring to the bill and also to the report which was made upon it. On February 27, 1890, Mr. BINGHAM introduced in this House—

A bill (H.R. 7559) to fix the rate of postage on periodical publications containing the print or reprint of books.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act all publications purporting to be issued periodically and to subscribers, but which are merely books or reprints of books, whether they be issued complete or in parts, whether they be bound or unbound, or whether they be sold by subscription or otherwise, when offered for transmission by mail, shall be subject to postage at the rate prescribed by law for third-class matter.

The report on that bill was made April 7, 1890, by Mr. BING-HAM, the chairman of the committee. The opening paragraphs are as follows:

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 7558) to fix the rate of postage on periodical publications containing the print or reprint of books, submit the following report:

A bill of like character passed the House of Representatives, Fiftieth Congress, and Mr. Blount of Georgia submitted the following report:

Then follows the report previously made by Mr. Blount.
This report of the gentleman from Pennsylvania then goes on to quote the language of the Postmaster-General, on pages 43, 44, 45, and 46 of his report for 1889.

The report further states:

In letter under date of March 7, 1890, the Postmaster-General thus addresses the chairman of Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Then, after giving the letter of Postmaster-General Wanamaker, the report concludes:

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

It seems, therefore, from the statement of this report that a bill of similar character to this was passed in the Fiftieth Congress, and that a similar bill was introduced, fathered, and favorably reported upon by the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, General BINGHAM.

Now, the gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson] asks us to state the reasons why this bill should be passed. Those reasons have been given. I can add but little to the statement as already made. There are two reasons that stand out preeminent. In a room adjacent to this Hall, the Committee on Ways and Means of this House are engaged day after day hearing from representa-tive business men of the country their views in regard to the revision of the tariff—a measure made absolutely necessary by the deficiency of the revenues under the present system, $39,000,000 being the amount we are behind in receipts as compared with our expenditures for the fiscal year up to the present time. Taking in view this deficiency, it is proposed to increase the tariff duties. But, gentlemen, there is another way in which we can assist the revenues of the Government in addition to increasing the tariff. When a business man finds that he is running behind, he has the choice of two methods of improving his standing; one is to increase the receipts of his business if possible; the other is to cut down, if possible, its expenses. Both of these means are available to us. We hope shortly after the 4th of March of this year to enact a bill which shall increase the receipts of the Government: but it is none the less the duty of this House before the 4th of March, if possible, to assist in this good work of cutting off this deficit by a possible, to assist in this good work of cutting off this dencit by a proper economy—a cutting down wherever it can properly be done in the expenses of the Government.

I care not whether the amount that will be saved if this bill be passed be placed at $1,000,000 or $40,000,000. The principle is the same. If we can save $1,000,000 to this Government by the passage of this bill, it is our duty to do it. Gentlemen get up on the sage of this bill, it is our duty to do it. Gentlemen get up on the floor of this House and oppose the payment of the just debts of this Government in the way of war claims and other just obligations. When the amount is only a few hundred dollars, they debate and argue; they spend hours in opposition to the payment of just claims against the Government; yet they are willing to stand idly by and permit, or even directly to advocate, the continuance of an abuse in the postal system which year after year takes from the revenues of the Government not merely a few hundred or a few thousand dollars, but millions. The demand, therefore, is first on the ground of economical management of the Post-Office Department. But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there is a very much higher duty than even that of economy; there is a higher duty than the mere saving of dollars and cents to the Government, and that is the duty we owe, so far as the question of these serial novels is concerned, at any rate of transmission through the mails, to the morality of the youth of this country.

The gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson] may ridicule the idea that these novels are the means of transmitting immorality to the youth of our land. He says the transmission of one cheap edition of Dickens's novels through the mails at this cheap rate of postage more than compensates for the damage done by the transmission of the innumerable immoral novels that are sent to all parts of our land. But I say to you that one human soul saved is worth all of the intellectual development of the human mind that can be gathered by the use of Dickens's novels or the reading of Thackeray's novels or any other of the standard authors of the world. I say that the evil of such transmission through the mails is so widespread in regard to the serial novels, that the good done, as compared with the evil, is as a grain of wheat to a barrel of chaff. To be convinced of this fact it is only necessary to take a list of these publications and read it through. How many of these books would you select to put into the hands of your son and your daughter to be convinced of their working great injury to the morality of youth?

But I have here an article which will command the attention and respect of, I hope, even the gentleman from California himself. It is an article in a work entitled Books and Reading for the Young, by J. H. Smart, who was for twelve years past president of Purdue University at Lafayette, Ind., an educator known not only throughout the United States, but throughout the world. In regard to this class of literature that is circulated through our mails at the 1 cent a pound rate under the pretense of educational value, he says:

The extent to which vicious literature is read by the youth of this country is alarming. Tons upon tons of it are sent out from the larger cities all over the country, and our children read it and are demoralized by it. If one doubts this, let him read the reports of Anthony Comstock, or let him spend an hour at the news stands in our larger cities and towns; or, what is better, let him inquire of any teacher of youth who has given the subject attention.

let him inquire of any teacher of youth who has given the subject attention.

I am reliably informed that a large part of the bad literature that goes out of New York is sent to the great West, and I know from personal observation that much of it comes to the State of Indiana. The circulation of bad literature has become so extensive in New England that it has called out the following appeal, signed by such men as Noah Porter, Theodore D. Woolsey, Francis A. Walker, Leonard Baoon, Francis Wayland, and James E. English: "We desire to call attention to the cheap, trashy literature which is demoralizing the youth of our country. In this class we notice the paper named The New York Boys' Weekly, with a reputed circulation of 40,000, and the Boys of New York, with a reputed circulation of 50,000. These papers contain stories of the most sensational and slangy character, judging by the titles, of which we name the following: Dashing Dick, King of the Highway; Yankee Claude Duval, the Dashing Knight of the Road; Corkey, or the Tricks and Travels of a Supe; Shorty, jr., or the Son of His Dad; Bang Up, or the Boy Ranchero, etc. We see not one redeeming trait in these or other papers of this class. We are informed that many of the advertisements in their columns are of the most villainous kind. Will you not do what you can to warn your readers against the peril that besets our youth? "Our object is not to advertise any periodical in place of those we deprecate, but only to warn the public of a danger suspected by few and realized by fewer still."

There is also here a quotation from Prof. William G. Summer, of

There is also here a quotation from Prof. William G. Sumner, of Yale College, which I will not take the time of the committee to read, but it is of the same general character.

Now, the gentleman says that you can not tell much from the title of a book about what it is, but I have here a collection of books, and I think the titles would indicate about their character. I will say that some of them are made up of fairly good literature. I will say that some of them are made up of fairly good literature. The collection which I hold in my hand is from the Munro Library of popular novels. This publication was started long before the decision of Attorney-General Devens, which admitted this class of literature to the mails. I am informed by reliable business men, who know the facts, that the proprietors of this library—of this series of books—had made an immense fortune before the favorable construction of law by Attorney-General Devens, which gave them the privilege of sending this matter through the mails at a lower rate. Originally issued as weeklies or monthlies, I have forgotten which, they now issue them daily, so that every day one of these cheap novels goes into the mails, or is supposed to go into the mails. As a matter of fact, dozens and hundreds of them are dumped in together, of all sorts of issues and of all sorts of days, and these go through the United States mail at the rate of a cent and these go through the Chited States man at the rate of a central pound.

Now, I will take one of these, and from the catalogue which is published at the end will give you a sample of the general run of these books, and I will say also that George Munro & Sons, publishers—and this is only a type of the entire class—are not the publishers of one series only, but they have a great variety of names under which the publications are sent out, and a book which appears as number one of one series will appear as number. which appears as number one of one series will appear as number ten in another series or number fifteen in a third series. All they have to do is to tear off the paper back and paste a new one on, and instead of its being the Old Sleuth Series, for instance, or Old Sleuth Library, it will be The Boys Dashaway Library, or instead of that it may be Die Deutsche Library, or the Laurel Library, and so on and so on.

Now, here are some of the publications of the "Old Sleuth Library," which is stated to be "a series of the most thrilling detective stories ever published, issued quarterly, price 5 cents each," and I will say that there are 69 of them altogether. Old Sleuth, the Detective; The King of the Detectives; Old Sleuth's Triumph; Under a Million Disguises; Night Scenes in New York; Old Electricity, the Lightning Detective."

I am reading them right along, and if any gentleman can find one of these books that he would like to put into the hands of his son or daughter. I shall be very glad to have him pick it out for son or daughter, I shall be very glad to have him pick it out for me. The Robber Detective; Iron Burgess, the Government De-tective; The Brigands of New York, and so on for quantity and

Out of the entire 69 there is not one book that you or I would want to see in our households.

Now, gentlemen say that the present law is sufficient to exclude Now, gentlemen say that the present law is sufficient to exclude this class of literature. The law, if enforced, is sufficient to exclude a certain class of this abominable literature. The law gives the Post-Office authorities the right to throw out of the mail books containing obscene matter, but the law, as construed by the Department and by the Attorney-General, does not give the right to throw out of the mails books that are almost equally as villainous as those containing obscenity.

Let me read to you from a letter addressed by the Postmaster-General to the chairman of the Post-Office Committee, Hon. John S. Henderson, and found in the report of the committee on pages 21

Fourthly. The favoring of works of fiction, as is shown above, carries with it the circulation at practically the expense of the nation, of a very vicious class of literature. On this point I can not, perhaps, do better than to quote the views of the gentleman before alluded to. He says:

"But the worst side of this question I have not yet touched, and that is the wide diffusion of what, for want of a better name, may be termed the 'bigamy' school of fiction. I mean the writings of such novelists as Ouida, Adolphe Belot, Du Boisgobey, Dumas the younger, and the coarse and brutal pictures of Emile Zola.

"There are many novels of that class which every librarian who has any regard for the morals of the community deplores the existence of, novels which depict, sometimes in the most seductive, sometimes in the most repulsive, aspects the decline and fall of woman—novels in which where there is not a seduction, and very frequently there are both. Now, what kind of literature's is a seduction, and very frequently there are both. Now, what kind of literature is a that to bring into domestic circles, to be put forth by the thousand, and scattered all over your country to the exclusion, or at least to the prejudice, of decent and elevating literature?"

The gentlemen who advocate the allowance of this class of matter to go through the mails at the reduced rates, and thus to make the Government of the United States accessory to the distribution of this vicious stuff, have no plea to make for that higher class of literature which is really educational. The schoolbooks of the country do not go through the mails at a cent a pound. They have country do not go through the mails at a cent a pound. They have no plea to make for the Holy Bible. That does not go through the mails at a cent a pound unless it is cut up into sections, in order to defraud the Government, as these book publishers have done. Your religious tracts do not go through the mails in the same class with this literature. They pay 8 cents a pound. Why, then, should this special favor be given to this class of publishers. There is no sentimentality about it. The newspapers that are demanding free sample copies and these serial publishers who are demanding these privileges are business men. They are in the business for the purpose of making money. They do with their money when it is made just what every other business man does. There is no special appeal that they can make to us to favor them There is no special appeal that they can make to us to favor them in assisting their business. When it comes to the legitimate newspaper publications—the issues of the great dailies, the weeklies, and the monthly magazines—they form a different class of literature. It has been the policy of this Government to favor that literature for the general dissemination of information and knowledge. edge. But when it comes to this class of literature, they are nothing more than books—books with paper covers. There is no more reason why the mere manner in which a publication is bound shall make a discrimination in its favor of 7 cents a pound than there is why we should discriminate between a sample of merchandise sent through the mails in a canvas bag and the same sample of merchandise sent in a paper bag. They are exactly the same book. A work of Dickens is a book whether it is bound in paper or bound in cloth.

Now, why should a cloth-bound book of Dickens pay 8 cents a pound for transmission through the mails while a paper-bound book pays but 1 cent a pound? Not the difference in the binding. That can not be the reason. There never was any intention to include these books in this privileged class. The publishers saw that all that was necessary was to use the name of some series—Household Series, Favorite Series, Sleuth Series, Detective Series, or something else, then mark it volume 1, number 1, issued daily, weekly, or monthly, as the case may be, subscription $12 a year, take it down to the post-office, make a false oath to the post-master, and they would get their books through the mail at a

Now, it may be thought that I am using extravagant language when I say "by making a false oath." I have had a communication handed me by the Postmaster-General, which consisted of an affidavit made by the former owner of a New York sample-copy paper. I refer to it as a sample-copy paper, because he admitted in his affidavit and made the statement that this paper had 7,000 legitimate paid-up subscribers: that on the strength of the 7,000 subscribers there were 68,000 copies sent out, and 32,000 sample copies of this publication. In other words, on the strength of a legitimate circulation and subscription of 7,000, 100,000 copies were sent out through the mails. This affidavit was filed with the Postmaster-General

Mr. CANNON. I will ask, for information, if the gentleman will allow me, was this against the law?

Mr. BROMWELL. I understand it was against the law, and he may be prosecuted.

Mr. CANNON. Why was he not sent to the penitentiary if he

Mr. CANNON. Why was he not sent to the pententiary if ne was guilty of violating the law?

Mr. BROMWELL. Possibly he may have been; I do not know. I intended this as one illustration of the abuse of the sample-copy privilege. I am not here saying that he would not make himself amenable to the laws. I do not know what the circumstances were as to that; but in his affidavit he stated that on the basis of 7,000 subscription list he was able to send out 100,000 papers, 32,000 of which were sample copies.

Mr. CANNON. But that is clearly against the law.

Mr. BROMWELL. Undoubtedly it is.

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend think it is safe to repeal a law that some believe is beneficial in its general results because some individual has violated that law?

Mr. BROMWELL. Well, so far as that is concerned, I will answer the gentleman this way: I believe that this Post-Office Department ought to be managed, if possible, in its different branches so as to pay its expenses. I believe that the sample-copy privilege is one of the reasons why a deficiency exists; and it seems to me, from all the information we can get, a reason why the sample-copy privilege ought to be withdrawn. Do I answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman answers by giving one of the means of cutting down the deficiency, or of wiping out the defimeans of cutting down the deficiency, or of wiping out the deficiency; but I will point the gentleman to one other very important consideration. For instance, in each county a paper goes absolutely free of postage. In every county of the United States, as I understand, a paper published in that county has the franking privilege. Now, if the gentleman does not interfere with that, as I understand his bill, I would like to have him say so.

Mr. BROMWELL. I will answer the gentleman by saying that if the expenses of the Post-Office Department can be brought within its income by cutting off serial publications alone, then I would be willing to have sample copies go out so far as that could be done without entailing additional expense; and if it became necessary to curtail the expenses by curtailing the sample copies.

necessary to curtail the expenses by curtailing the sample copies, I would cut them off; and if it required additional economy to bring the expenses of the Post-Office Department within its receipts, I should be in favor of cutting off the county free matter. Of course, it has been the policy for years to allow free county matter to go through the mails. Whether it would be wise or politic to withdraw that privilege from county free matter is another question politic to withdraw that privilege from county free matter is another question.

Mr. CANNON. I am not advocating that. I simply wanted to get at the theory on which the gentleman was proceeding.

Mr. BROMWELL. Reference was made, I think, by the gentleman from New York to the fact that the American Newspaper Publishers' Association represented only a small portion, numerically, of the newspapers published in the United States. I believe he said only 170 out of about 1,800 newspapers. I have here a circular of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, indorsing this bill, which was adopted by the association, by the unanimous vote of the executive committee, on February 20, 1896, and afterwards by the unanimous vote of the association on February and afterwards by the unanimous vote of the association on February 21, 1896. I find by reference to the list of members of this ruary 21, 1896. I find by reference to the list of members of this association that it is composed of newspapers nearly all of which are of national reputation. The press of nearly every large city in the United States is represented. There are five papers from Albany, N. Y., two from Augusta, Ga., three from Baltimore, one from Bangor, eight or nine from Boston, five from Brooklyn, three from Buffalo, and I believe nearly every newspaper published in my own city, Cincinnati, is upon the list. There are eight or ten from Philadelphia, six or eight from Pittsburg, five or six from St. Louis, and so on through the list. I am also informed that while it is true that the number of these papers is but a small percentage of the whole number of publications of this kind in the United States, yet the actual output of the papers upon this list constitutes about 75 per cent of the newspaper matter issued in the country

Mr. MILLIKEN. What class of papers does the gentleman refer to now?

Mr. BROMWELL. The papers that make up the American Publishers' Association.

Mr. QUIGG. Daily newspapers, are they not?

Mr. BROMWELL. Yes, sir; daily newspapers, and they indorse this bill

Mr. MILLIKEN. Is it not just possible that they desire to get rid of competition?

Mr. BROMWELL. These are for the most part daily newspapers; but gentlemen know that Harper's Weekly is not a daily publication, and I have here an article from Harper's Weekly, under date of April 11, 1896, indorsing this bill. I will read it:

THE LOUD BILL. It is to be hoped that Congress will not adjourn before passing the Loud bill, which seeks to limit second-class matter strictly to newspapers and periodicals. A strong effort is being made to defeat the measure, and there seems to be some misconception at Washington as to the attitude toward it of some of the publishers of periodicals. The Weekly has favored this bill simply because it is for the general interest that it should become a law. The Government is now losing annually between $18,000,000 and $19,000,000 as the result of a perversion of the law.

The law of 1885 fixing the rate of postage on newspapers and periodicals at 1 cent a pound is a liberal law, and was intended primarily for the benefit of readers of such publications. It is the policy of the Government to extend the circulation of periodical literature, and to help to cheapen it to the people by reducing the charge for carrying it in the mails. Every abuse of this law which adds to the cost of maintaining the Post-Office Department is a menace to the law itself, for if the abuse continue, there will inevitably come a time when the Government must fix the charge for carrying second-class matter at a rate which will cover the cost of transportation. It will be remembered that the enormous loss resulting from the second-class matter of books, advertising circulars, enormous sample editions, and other publications not properly included in second-class matter. Recently the sample edition of one publication alone, as we learn from the report of the committee, weighed 300,000 pounds. Its carriage in the mails cost the Government $24,000. As the postage paid was $3,000, the Government tost $21,000 on this one edition. We have the estimate of the Department that if the perversion of the law should cease, the post-office ould afford to carry periodicals for nothing, and this certainly indicates the extent of the abuse.

The abuse ought to be stopped not only because it is the cause of such enormous expense to the Government, but because it interferes with the rights of the great majority of those who use the post-office. The post-office is established primarily for the carrying of letters. At t

I have also the proceedings of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association to which I have already referred, and which I insert in my remarks at this point:

The American Newspaper Publishers' Association (composed of publishers f leading dailies) approve Mr. Loud's postal bill—
First, by the unanimous vote of the executive committee, February 20, 1896.

THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

[From the Brooklyn Times, February 21, 1896.]

[From the Brooklyn Times, February 21, 1896.]

The executive committee of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association entertained Congressman E. F. Loud, chairman of the Postal Committee of Congress, and Third Assistant Postmaster-General Craige at dinner last evening at the Hotel Waldorf, where they discussed the postal bill relating to second-class mail matter, which has lately been introduced in Congress by Mr. Loud, and after a full debate and a thorough examination into the merits of the bill, the members of the executive committee unanimously agreed to report back to the meeting of the association to-day that the executive committee fully indorsed the bill, and would ask the members to give it their hearty and earnest support.

The following were present: Charles W. Knapp, of the St. Louis Republic; Congressman E. F. Loud; Third Assistant Postmaster-General Craige; M. A. McRae, of the Cincinnait Post; J. A. Butler, of the Buffalo News; W. H. Seif, of the Pittsburg Times; Herbert F. Gunnison, of the Brooklyn Eagle; S. H. Kauffmann, of the Washington Star: H. Montgomery, of the Chicago Tribune; D. N. Houser, of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, and William C. Bryant, of the Brooklyn Times.

The, by the unanimous vote of the association, February 21, 1896.

THE ASSOCIATION.

[From the New York Times, February 22, 1896.]

The American Newspaper Publishers' Association concluded its annual meeting at the Brunswick Hotel last evening with a banquet. The association has been in session for the last three days, the attendance has been very large, and the amount of work transacted greater than at any previous ses-

Nearly all the emount of work transacted greater than at any previous session.

Nearly all the officers of the association were present, including President Charles W. Knapp, of the St. Louis Republic; Vice-President J. A. Butler, of the Buffalo News: W. C. Bryant, of the Brooklyn Times; M. A. McRae, general manager of the Cincinnati Post, St. Louis Chronicle, and Cleveland Press; S. H. Kauffman, of the Washington Star, and W. H. Seif, of the Pittsburg

A vote of the association was then taken, and it was found to be unani-mously in favor of the Loud bill as it had been reported.

Publishers of legitimate newspapers advocate the passage of the Loud bill because it strikes at the root of the abuses which have led to a very large and growing loss in the postal revenues and have called forth the protests and recommendations of successive Postmasters-General.

So long as the newspaper rates were confined to copies mailed to subscribers the present difficulties had no existence; but since 1879, when these rates were extended to sample copies, thousands of publications, bearing sufficient resemblance to regular newspapers to obtain admission to the second class, have been established, mainly for the purpose of circulating sample copies, which, when once entered as second-class publications, they are entitled to send out in unlimited quantities.

This is a rapidly growing evil which is injuring both the revenues of the Government and the business of established newspapers.

If the Loud bill is passed, this privilege will be withdrawn. Second-class rates will apply only to copies mailed to regular subscribers and the temptation to evasions of the law, which are at present so ruinous to regular publishers and the post-office revenues, will cease.

The issuing of books as pretended serials, when in fact they have few or no subscribers, was never intended by the framers of the present law.

It is far preferable that a reasonable and moderate reform, such as would be accomplished by Mr. Loud's bill, should be carried into effect than that the abuses in connection with second-class matter should be allowed to continue until the loss to the Government becomes so tremendous that a recasting of the whole system shall become necessary.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] seems to assume that the raising of the rate of postage for these periodicals must result in these publishers going out of business. That is his assumption. He figures that we get so much postage now, and that if we raise the rate we shall lose all of that postage and also the postage which is incidental to that; that the first-class postage, and also the incidental postage from third and fourth class matter, will be lost, because we shall have closed out this line of business.

Now, if such publications as Munro's could exist before the de-cision of the Attorney-General, and if the publishers could become wealthy while paying postage at the old rates, it is not very likely that, with the improved facilities they now have for getting out cheap literature, with the cheapening of paper, and the fact that in many instances, as I am told, the publishers have their own paper mills, so that they make the profit upon the paper as well as the profit upon the books—in view of these facts and considerations it is not at all likely that an increase from I cent to 8 cents a pound in the rate of postage would result in election them. tions it is not at all likely that an increase from 1 cent to 8 cents a pound in the rate of postage would result in closing them out. Here, for instance [illustrating], is a book that weighs about 2 ounces, one-eighth of a pound. If this were mailed at the pound rate, the postage upon it would be 1 cent. How much does that add to the cost of the book? Instead of selling it at 5 cents they could sell it at 6 cents and let the purchaser pay the additional postage. postage.

could sell it at 6 cents and let the purchaser pay the additional postage.

But gentlemen who are opposing this bill do not seem to have agreed together upon one point. In some of these boiler-plate protests that seem to emanate from some syndicate, from some central headquarters, modified in language just enough to keep them from being exactly the same—in some of these protests it is stated that if we pass this bill the poor publishers will be driven into bankruptcy, that the paper mills will be closed down, that the typesetters will all be thrown out of work, that the mail carriers will be discharged, that the news agents will have to go to the poorhouse, and, reasoning along that line, they appeal to us to let the existing law stand, so as to keep up the great body of manufacturers and distributers of this kind of literature. On the other hand, another class of the epponents of this bill speak from a directly opposite standpoint. They say it does not make any difference to the publishers whether we pass this bill or not. They take no interest in publishers, but they say that we are not attacking or injuring them, that it is not the publishers who are to suffer, but the consumers. The publisher will go right on, they say; he will simply add the additional postage to the price of his publications, and the consumer will pay just so much more for them, [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, I desire to take this opportunity of answering somewhat more fully than the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bromwell.] did the question that was addressed to him by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Cannon].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Quigg] is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. QUIGG. No, sir; I am proceeding in my own time.

is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. QUIGG. No, sir; I am proceeding in my own time.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman could not, without the unanimous consent of the committee, which has been given, occupy more than one hour.

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman from Illinois inquired concerning the fraudulent character of a transaction which the gentleman from Ohio described. I wish to read the provision of the statute on that subject.

That any person who shall submit or cause to be submitted to any post-master or to the Post-Office Department or any officer of the postal service any false evidence relative to the character of any publication, for the pur-pose of securing the admission thereof at the second-class rate for transpor-tation in the mails, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and for every offense, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $500.

So that if the gentleman from Ohio has information from the Department that a crime of this sort has been committed, the duty of the Department under the statute is obvious.

Mr. LOUD. I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. Ogden].

Mr. OGDEN. Mr. Chairman, I recognize in this bill the culmination of a long-felt want. The object of the measure is to correct an abuse that has grown up in our postal service, as shown by the successive reports of various Postmasters-General, beginning with the recommendation of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General in 1892 followed by the report of Postmaster General. General in 1883, followed by the report of Postmaster-General Wanamaker, by that of Postmaster-General Bissell, by that of Postmaster-General Bissell, by that of Postmaster-General Wilson, and by the message of the President of the United States recently submitted to Congress. The Postmaster-General, after stating that the total deficit, omitting the amount credited to the Pacific railroads, was $8,127,088.44, says:

There is no necessity for this annual deficit. The Department is powerless to prevent it, but a few lines of amendment by Congress to the postal laws will wipe it out and give in its place a steady surplus. It has its chief source in the transmission at second-class rates of a large and rapidly increasing volume of matter never in the contemplation of the law, which gives the nominal rate of I cent a pound on such matter, and assuredly outside of the policy of the law as to newspapers and periodicals.

For years the attention of Congress and of the people has been called by this Department to this gross and growing abuse. Vigorous efforts were made by my immediate predecessors, Postmaster-General Wanamaker and Postmaster-General Bissell, to secure legislation which would protect the postal service from this waste of its revenues and the taxpayers from the large burden imposed on them by the regular deficits.

The increase in the weight of second-class matter for the year was 37,000,000 pounds, as against 13,000,000 pounds last year. The mere cost of transportation of this matter is estimated at 8 cents a pound. The postage revenue received from it was 8½ mills a pound. Thus 349,000,000 pounds, in round numbers, at 8 cents a pound for transportation, cost $27,020,000; postal revenue received, at 8½ mills per pound, $2,966,403, a loss on transportation alone of nearly $25,000,000.

It thus appears that from two-thirds of the matter handled the last fiscal year the revenue was less than one-thirtieth of the cost of the mail service.

Whether an abuse exists or not in connection with our postal system is a question which ought to be considered by this House. I do not say, because Mr. Wanamaker called the attention of Congress to this matter, or because Mr. Bissell did the same, or because Mr. Wilson has emphasized the existence of this evil, or because the President of the United States has indorsed the views of these several officials, that therefore a measure of this kind must nece sarily be right. But certainly the fact that these officers of the Government, following their duty, have thus called attention to the abuses which have grown up is no reason why gentlemen here should vote against this bill.

I always listen to the gentleman from California [Mr. Johnson] with a great deal of interest, and often with amusement. But his reasons for not supporting this bill seem to me in the main to amount to this: That because Mr. Wanamaker, and Mr. Bissell, and Mr. Wilson, and the President of the United States have called attention to this subject is reason why he and those who think with him should vote against the measure. I am not as good at relating an anecdote as my friend from California, but his attirelating an anecdote as my friend from California, but his attitude on this question reminds me of a story I heard of a little boy. About Christmas time, he had in his hand a nice piece of cake and was met by one of his companions, who asked, "Why don't you eat your cake; ain'tit good?" "Oh, yes," was the reply, "it is good, but grandma said I might eat it; and you know I don't do anything that grandma wants me to do." Now, I listered for helf an hour to the grandma wants from California from California and the said of the grandma wants from California tened for half an hour to the remarks of the gentleman from California, and after all, his position, it seemed, was that he did not want to do anything that the officers of the Government had recommended that Congress should do.

I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I do not always follow the advice of the officers of the Government; but I do think that when they offer important recommendations, those recommendations ought to be considered fairly and justly upon their merits and should not be opposed through a spirit of factious opposition. If the recommendation is wise, fair, just—if it commends itself to our judgment then it is our duty to follow it.

ment-then it is our duty to follow it.

The whole question presented here is whether this is a bill which Congress ought to pass. Under what auspices does it come before this body? As already stated, it had been recommended by three Postmasters-General and by the President of the United States. It was introduced by the distinguished genmended by three Postmasters-General and by the President of the United States. It was introduced by the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and comes back here with the unanimous report of that committee in its favor. Is that report to be discredited without reason? Has any gentleman on this floor shown why it should be discredited? Is it not a fact that abuses have crept into our postal service? Is it not a fact, as stated by Postmaster-General Wilson, that the second-class matter, embracing in weight about two-thirds of all which passes through the mails, is handled for about one-tenth of the cost of transportation alone? transportation alone?

Does anyone deny it? Is there any gentleman here who will dispute that statement? Ought we not to be just before we undertake to be generous? Ought we not to be just before we undertake to be generous? Ought we not to listen to the story of the wants and the needs of the people of the United States rather than give transportation through the mails to millions of pounds of mail matter at one-tenth of what it actually costs to transport it? That

To show the extent of our generosity, I submit the following average postal revenue, as shown by the Postmaster-General's report, from each pound of mail matter:

 First-class matter cents
 93

 Second-class matter mills
 8.5

 Third-class matter cents
 13.1

 Fourth-class matter do 15.6

It seems to me that these simple statements of facts is a sufficient answer to the assertion of my friend from California [Mr. Johnson] that the friends of the bill had given no reason for its sup-or its passage.

I believe in the policy of the Government practiced for many years in allowing newspapers and other legitimate publications very low rates. The provisions of this bill in no wise affects very low rates. The provisions of this bill in no wise affects them. But we do propose to exclude from the benefits of this rate millions of pounds of matter that was never intended by the act of 1885 to be transported as second-class matter.

This bill is in no wise partisan. It was enforced by a number of Republican ex-Postmasters-General while they were in office, it has been indorsed by two Democratic Postmasters-General, nce, it has been indorsed by two Democratic Postmasters-General, and it has been indorsed by the President of the United States. It has been indorsed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads of the House, at whose head is a distinguished Republican member of this body, and it comes before the House without any minority report whatever against it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there has absolutely been no reason given by the opponents of this measure why it should not pass. And while Layer the floor. It want to give not be reason for some variety of the proposed of the second pass.

while I have the floor I want to give another reason for favoring the bill. I favor it because it would result in a saving to the Government, in my judgment, of not less than $10,000,000 a year in the transportation of the mails; which, if that saving be made, would make it possible for a succeeding Congress to put into exe cution measures of relief to certain persons who have to perform their work for the Government at ridiculously low prices. I speak of the fourth-class postmasters of the country.

In this connection I will say that since I have been a member of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads I have found that while we were giving largesses to some classes of our people, and while we were giving largesses to some classes of our people, and while we were being generous to certain publishers throughout the United States to the extent of $10,000,000 a year of the people's money, we were pursuing a niggardly policy to many thousands of fourth-class postmasters. Mr. Chairman, in order to be able to frame some measure of relief for these deserving employees, I wrote to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department and afterwards to the Postmaster General Office Department, and afterwards to the Postmaster-General himself, requesting certain specific information relative to compensation of fourth-class postmasters. This information was de-nied me on the plea of a lack of clerical force. I then introduced a resolution in the House calling for the information, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to furnish this House at an early date the following information in regard to the salaries of fourth-class postmasters, to wit:

Number of fourth-class postmasters whose salaries are $50 per annum or less, and the aggregate amount of the same.

Number of fourth-class postmasters whose salaries exceed $50 and are not above $100 per annum, and the aggregate amount of the same.

Number of fourth-class postmasters whose salaries exceed $100 and are not above $200 per annum, and the aggregate amount of the same.

Number of fourth-class postmasters whose salaries exceed $200 and are not above $500 per annum, and the aggregate amount of the same.

Number of fourth-class postmasters whose salaries exceed $500 and are not above $500 per annum, and the aggregate amount of the same.

This resolution was introduced in the House on the 17th day of March, and was reported and passed on the 23d. The Postmaster-General made no direct response to this order of the House, but on page 19 of his annual report, recently submitted to Congress, he gives the exact information called for by the resolution. My reason now for calling the attention of the House to this matter is that if the pending bill is passed I believe that we can be able to take up and dispose of the matter of proper compensation of these fourth-class postmasters, as well as in respect to the com-pensation of the letter carriers, and in regard to the reclassifica-tion of clerks, whose request for a reform in this matter ought to be listened to with respect.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OGDEN. Certainly. Mr. MILLIKEN. How will the passage of this bill accomplish that result?

Mr. OGDEN. I will tell the gentleman. If you save the money in this direction, it can be applied in other ways. When asked why you do not increase the salaries of the fourth-class postmasters, the answer is always that we have a deficit of millions of dollars a year in the postal service, and an annual deficit in our public revenues of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000, and therefore it is idle to talk of remedying these abuses. When letter carriers come before Congress and ask a remedy, the same answer is given to them as is given to the postmasters, and, as has been stated by gentlemen on the floor, the same answer is unavoidably and invariably given in respect to any other question of claims against the Government, no matter how just they are.

But let me again state some of the reasons for the passage of this bill. In the first place, I think we will be able to save eight this bill. In the first place, I think we will be able to save eight or ten millions of dollars annually in the postal service—

Mr. MILLIKEN. Just a word, if the gentleman will permit me, in that very connection. That is just the point. The issue between the gentlemen and myself is on that proposition of knocking off a deficit, or of saving $8,000,000 of expenditures. If the gentleman would make that perfectly clear, that we can save eight millions or ten millions, or even five millions of dollars, I will vote with him for the bill, just as the gentleman from New York said that he would

Will vote with find for the only just to the Santa San when we are informed as to the extent of its transmission through the mails it is manifest that if we prevent its transmission at the present price we will not be involved in this great expense without present price we will proper compensation.

Proper compensation.

Wr. MILLIKEN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question.

Proper I do not suppose tion? I do not want to interrupt him, because I do not suppose he wants to be interrupted. I suppose the real purpose of this bill, and the purpose of the Post-Office Department in bringing it here—for they certainly were instrumental in bringing it here—and the purpose of the committee, was to curtail expenditures and make a saving to the Government. Now, my own belief is that they will not save a cent, and if they do not save a cent, why, they are not correcting any abuses.

Mr. OGDEN. Well, when you have the opportunity, in your time, you may prove that it will not save a cent, if you can. We believe it will save millions, and are proceeding on that theory. Then, we have thousands of people behind us who, if we do save these millions, will have an opportunity to come up and present their grievances to Congress.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will help the gentleman to correct those grievances. I am with him on that.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Does not the gentleman think that the burden of proof is upon those who favor the passage of this bill?

Mr. OGDEN. Oh, well, that matter of the burden of proof is stale.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. But is not the burden of proof upon you?
Mr. OGDEN. I think it has already been proven. You must disprove it. Postmaster-General Wanamaker says it is proved, and he puts it at two millions.
Mr. FAIRCHILD. The report puts it at $1,000,000.
Mr. OGDEN. Postmaster-General Wilson puts it at $8,000,000.

Mr. OGDEN. Postmaster-General Wilson puts it at $8,000,000. You must disprove the statement of these gentlemen. I take the statements as true. You must disprove those statements.

Now I propose to go on with my line of argument.

As I stated, I introduced a resolution, because as a member of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads I found a bill which was introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS]. I also found another bill, introduced by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER]. I also found other bills looking to the increase of the compensation of fourth-class postmasters. I found those bills, but could find no data to act upon. It is idle to come before this House, as gentlemen well know, and talk about passing measures without presenting proper data for talk about passing measures without presenting proper data for consideration.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Did you find a letter carriers' bill there? Mr. OGDEN. I did. I voted for it in committee, and it is upon the Calendar of this House.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Why did you not bring that up instead of

Mr. OGDEN. I am not the chairman of the committee, and I am not of the majority of this House. You might just as well ask me why I am not Jack the Giant Killer, or why I do not climb up to heaven, as another Jack tried to do. [Laughter.] But now

I want to put before this House and before the people of this country, because it is new matter to them, this information from the report of the Postmaster-General. I want to tell you that there are 21,875 fourth-class postmasters whose average salary is only $25 a year. That is an astounding statement, but it is true. Their salary is only $2.10 a month, or less than 7 cents a day. That is what 21,000 fourth-class postmasters get for their work. That is what 21,000 fourth-class postmasters get for their work. They are required to give bond, to keep their offices open six days in the week, and to keep a set of books, and render reports at stated intervals. It is a startling fact that the aggregate compensation of these over 21,000 postmasters is $60,000 less than the allowance made for rent, light, and fuel to the third-class postoffices of the United States, numbering 2,776. There are 15,650 postmasters whose average pay is only $75 a year. They are a little better off, for they get $6.25 a month.

Mr. COX. Are those Presidential offices?

Mr. OGDEN. No; they are fourth-class postmasters. They get $6.25 per month, or 21 cents a day. There are 13,000 more who receive an average of $150 a year, or $12.50 a month, or 42 cents a day.

Mr. TRACEY. Do you find any difficulty in finding candidates for those offices?

Mr. OGDEN. Yes: frequently for the smaller ones, and I will appeal to every member of this House who represents a country district that the trouble with reference to the smaller offices is to keep them from being discontinued. But there are often zealous men and women, too-

Mr. COX. Who want the office.

Mr. OGDEN. They do not know what is in store for them until they get a fourth-class post-office whose salary is less than $50 a year, for then their troubles begin.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OGDEN. Yes.
Mr. MILLIKEN. My friend was in Congress at the incoming of the present Administration of his own party?
Mr. OGDEN. No; I was not.
Mr. MILLIKEN. Then you escaped great misery. [Laughter.]
Mr. OGDEN. I agree with you. I hope you will escape an equally great one when your party comes in. [Laughter.]
Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. We shall escape it, and those on his side will encounter it.

on his side will encounter it.

Mr. MILLIKEN. You will escape it because we will have it. But I was going to ask my friend if, for every post-office, no matter how small it might be, in his country, there were not plenty of candidates:

Mr. OGDEN. Only when it is a paying office. I believe the

mr. OGDEN. Only when it is a paying office. I believe the gentleman is from Maine?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Certainly.

Mr. OGDEN. If he will hunt around in Maine, he will probably find some trouble, especially if he has it to do under a Republican Administration instead of a Democratic, and without proper

Mr. MILLIKEN. There are very few cases where men are not willing to serve their Government in the civil service for a consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not at 7 cents a day.
Mr. OGDEN. Maine patriots are not built that way.
Mr. MILLIKEN. They are well built.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has expired.

Mr. OGDEN. I ask leave to print the accompanying table with my remarks.

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIGG. I will yield to my colleague from New York. How much time does the gentleman desire?
Mr. CUMMINGS. Twenty minutes.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield twenty minutes to my colleague from New York.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, this bill came unexpectedly before the House in the morning hour. No notice was given to its opponents. It appeared so unexpectedly that the House was its opponents. It appeared so unexpectedly that the House was dependent upon the courtesy of the chairman of the committee for copies of the reports accompanying the bill. The measure comes before the House now as a special order. The men whose interests are affected by it have had a fortnight in which to put in a protest against it. They have not been idle. The House is being inundated with protests. When my friend from California boldly asserted that the American Publishers' Association, representing apparently all the daily papers published in the United States, favored this bill. I was somewhat astonished. If that were true, I felt as though it might be my duty to go back on my convictions as heretofore expressed on the floor of the House, and vote for the bill. But, sir, it was not true. I have here a copy of the New York Tribune of December 30. I read this extract:

The American Publishers' Association, an organization useful to its own members, does not represent the Herald and the Tribune—

Mr. MAHANY. But it does represent all the rest, I believe? Mr. CUMMINGS. You are welcome to the Journal and other papers favoring your party.
Mr. MAHANY. I am glad we have them.
Mr. CUMMINGS (continuing):

two of the largest daily newspapers in New York City, and it only represents at the utmost 161 out of a total of more than 1,860 daily newspapers published throughout the length and breadth of our country.

Upon the indorsement of this publishers' association you are to assume that the newspaper press of the United States is in favor of this bill. Gentlemen, 85 per cent of the newspaper press of the United States is composed of newspapers publishing less than 1,000 copies of each issue. You are feeding the "killies" to the sharks. copies of each issue. You are feeding the "killies" to the sharks. These are the newspapers that you strike at, in the interest of the American Publishers' Association.

Mr. MAHANY. How do you know that?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I have a statement prepared by Mr. George P. Rowell showing it. I can prove it, if you desire.

Mr. MAHANY. Can you give a list of them?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I can; every one of them. You will find them in Rowell's Newspaper Directory.

Now I read in the Tribune something further concerning the monits of this bill.

merits of this bill:

The purpose of his measure

The Tribune honestly says is undoubtedly to stop abuses. Its actual object, therefore, is beyond criticism. * * * But—why tear down the whole building merely to get rid of one broken beam? .

And that is precisely what you propose to do. There is no sense whatever in some of the provisions of the bill. You charge a higher rate of postage upon alleged sample copies and compel publishers to insert their supplemental sheet in the main sheet. Now, let us see how that will work. The Daily News of New York every Sunday furnishes to its subscribers and buyers a supplemental sheet, containing a complete novel, either from Dickens, Thackeray, Barrie, or one of the latest novels issued either in England or America. By the passage of this bill you rob the country boy of his privilege. He buys the Sunday News to obtain that novel. You rob him in the interest of the rich and against

Mr. OGDEN. If my friend will allow me to interrupt him, let him pay for his privilege.

Mr. CUMMINGS. He does pay for his privilege when he buys the newspaper.
Mr. OGDEN.

Mr. OGDEN. Not at all. Mr. CUMMINGS. That is the law, and you are changing it so as to take his privilege from him.

Mr. MAHANY. Do you believe that the Post-Office Department ought to be a free circulating library?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I believe that the Post-Office Department ought to obey the law-that the head of the Post-Office Departought to obey the law—that the head of the Post-Onice Department ought not to do, as it has done, say to Congress, "You defeat the proposed legislation if you please; I shall carry it out despite your action." My friend here, Mr. MILLIKEN, asks me if the Department is originated for the purpose of making money out of the people. That is a very proper question. The Department is the servant of the people. It must carry out the wishes of the people by obeying the law.

is the servant of the people. It must carry out the wishes of the people by obeying the law.

Mr. MAHANY. It is not originated for the purpose of making money, but it is expected to pay its own expenses.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Why do not the Navy Department and the War Department pay their own expenses?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Another pat question. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have on my desk a petition from over a thousand news dealers and booksellers in the city of New York against the passage of this bill. They say:

It is inimical to the interests of the news dealers and their thousands of employees. It repeals rights and privileges and usages guaranteed by previous legislation, and especially by the postal acts of 1879 and 1885. It will decrease the business of the trade. Its hypothesis that it will save money to the Post-Office Department is a fallacy, because by its restrictions on second-class matter it will inevitably and greatly decrease the revenue on first and third and fourth class matter. It is from all business and political standpoints reactionary, revolutionary, and repressive. For these reasons, which a due consideration of the nature and inevitable results of this proposed measure will establish, we enter our earnest protest against the act.

You injure and possibly destroy business founded upon the law

You injure and possibly destroy business founded upon the law as it is by passing this measure.

I have here a communication from the editor of American Gardening, an agricultural newspaper. He says:

Yours, respectfully,
A. T. DE LA MARE PTG. AND PUB. CO., LTD., Publishers American Gardening and The Florists' Exchange.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes, sir. Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes, sır.

Mr. LOUD. That gentleman, in the communication you have just read, makes a point against this bill because it provides, he says, that subscribers must pay in advance. Does not the gentleman from New York know that this bill does not change the present law in that respect in the slightest particular?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes; but you avoid the point which he makes. You cut off all the country newspaper exchanges.

Mr. QUIGG. Yes; and the bill also provides that the Postmaster-General must be satisfied that the subscriptions are voluntary.

ter-General must be satisfied that the subscriptions are voluntary, so that if he does not like the color of a man's beard all he has to do is to say that his subscriptions are not voluntary, and therefore exclude him from the mails.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Now, Mr. Chairman, having heard from the agricultural press, let us hear from the religious press. The Independent was edited for a long time by Henry Ward Beecher. From its publisher I have this communication:

The better class of newspapers, in my opinion, do not favor the provisions of the Loud bill prohibiting sending as second-class matter-sample copies and back numbers of genuine periodicals.

Added to this I have a strong petition against the bill from the Rev. John J. Wynne, S. J.; Rev. Denis T. O'Sullivan, S. J.; Rev. James Conway, S. J.; Rev. Henry Van Renssalaer, S. J., publishers of Messenger of the Sacred Heart, Pilgrim of Our Lady of Martyrs, The Decade Leaflets, Calendar of Monthly Intentions, The Messenger of the Lagran Director senger Supplement, and The League Director.
I give an extract from the petition:

I give an extract from the petition:

It will throw out of employment hundreds of thousands of working men and women engaged in the printing, paper making, electrotyping, and allied trades, entailing distress and calamity the extent of which can hardly be estimated.

The advocates of the bill maintain that its purpose is to reduce the deficiency in the postal revenues. They claim that there is a heavy loss to the Government in the carriage of second-class matter. This claim is untenable, because whatever loss there may be upon the carriage of second-class matter is fully offset by the gain upon the carriage of the two profitable classes, the first and fourth, which are a direct outgrowth of the mailing of second-class matter. Every publisher receives large numbers of letters and mails large quantities of "premiums" (fourth-class matter) to his subscribers and club raisers, and almost every advertisement is a bid for correspondence by mail and the consequent mailing of merchandise in filling orders. There are other causes than the carriage of second-class mail matter to account for the annual deficiency in the postal revenues, which would still be operative should the bill become a law. How, then, could the enactment of this measure reduce the deficiency?

The real beneficiaries of the measure are the express companies. By cutting off competition with the postal service they would be enabled to increase their rates and thus reap a rich harvest.

Lastly, it creates a virtual censorship of the press by giving to post-office officials the absolute right to determine what newspapers and periodicals shall have the advantage of the rates of second-class mail matter. It confers on the post-office the power to determine what newspapers and periodicals shall have the advantage of the rates of second-class mail matter. Next I have a communication from the manager of a newspaper with 169,000 paid subscriptions, the American Wheelman. It is a newspaper in which every man in America who rides the wheel is interested. What does this publisher say? I read:

a newspaper in which every man in America who rides the wheel is interested. What does this publisher say? I read:

Inasmuch as we consider that the passage of the bill would be detrimental to our interests and to the interests of the bicycle sport and industry which we represent, we write to request you to vote against its passage. You will doubtless hear or take part in the debate over the bill when it is brought up, and will hear all of the arguments that can be made for or against it. We will therefore not undertake in this letter to say all that can be said against its passage, but will merely call attention to those features of it which are particularly injurious to our interests.

The bill, by prohibiting the mailing of sample copies of publications at second-class rates, would have the effect of retarding if not entirely preventing, the legitimate growth of our circulation, as it would practically prohibit us from bringing our paper before the constantly increasing number of those who use bicycles and who are not familiar with the publications issued in its interests. This would not only injure us, but would also, we believe, be an attack upon the best interests of the entire country, because the introduction of the bicycle into any section thereof and the dissemination of literature published in its interests have had in the past and must continue to have in the future a very beneficial effect, inasmuch as it advocates the improvement of the highways of the country, which is recognized in all truly enlightened communities as a most beneficial thing, and is a powerful factor in the facilities for intercommunication and by increasing and diversifying their common interests.

The bicycle sport (if indeed it can be termed a sport; it has really come to be a good deal more than that) and industry, although it has already grown to large proportions and is supported by a large percentage of the population, is as yet in its infancy, and we think it would be unjust to place restrictions upon its further develop debate and will appeal to you, if you have not already made a study of the matter.

We feel warranted in making the request that you oppose the bill, as our company is a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, which you represent, and as the majority of the members of our staff are voters in the State.

Yours, truly,

THE AMERICAN WHEELMAN PUB. Co.,

THE AMERICAN WHEELMAN PUB. Co., H. L. SALTONSTALL, Manager, 23 Park Row, New York.

Now, I am a member of the American Wheelmen's Association. I shall vote against this bill because I believe the writer of that communication knows what he is talking about. Parenthetically,

I may say that I shall vote for good roads in every State in this Union, if the Federal Government has the power to give them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, having heard from the wheelmen and from the religious element and from the farmers, we come to the insurance interests. I have here a letter from the proprietor of the Insurance Critic, in which he says:

Insurance Critic, in which he says.

I take occasion to request that you will interest yourself, if you have not already done so, sufficiently to enable you to oppose the passage of Mr. Loub's bill (H. R. 4566) which, to my mind, is a very unjust one, and if enacted will work a very great hardship upon a large and very useful industry affecting many people conducting similar business to that which I am conducting. I take occasion to inclose to you a copy of the bill and trust that your sense of duty may enable you to comply with my request.

GEO. W. CORLISS, Proprietor.

Next I have a communication from the editor of a trade paper, a jewelers' paper. This editor says:

I wrote you in reference to the Loud bill (H. R. 4566), asking you to use your vote and influence against same, and enlarged to some extent upon what I then believed would be the evil arising, should such a bill be passed, in the way of restricting various industries upon which thousands of our people depend, and in cutting off the supply of valuable literature and information which our people now receive at a nominal expense. My opinion on the subject has not changed, and as I understand the bill is to be before the House on the 5th and 6th of January, 1897, and that on the 6th of the said month be brought to a vote. I again take this opportunity to ask you to do all in your power to suppress it.

I have also a letter from the McCall Company, publishers of the Queen of Fashion. Through this communication the ladies speak. It savs:

While we believe the Loud bill has some good features, it has too many that are not good, and, on the contrary, positively bad. On the whole, it is not for the best interests of publishers.

Next comes the theatrical profession. The editor of the Dramatic Mirror writes me as follows:

I am certain that the provisions of the bill which prohibit the return of unsold papers at the pound rate, and the exclusion from the same rate of sample copies of regular publications, are a serious blow to legitimate newspaper business, which, if the bill is enacted, will suffer incalculable injury there-

The publishers of this city are desirous that the disastrous import of the proposed legislation may be understood fully by our representatives.

Sincerely, yours,

HARRISON GREY FISKE

Now, gentlemen, times are hard enough, despite the result of the recent election. But this bill proposes to make them harder. On behalf of the 100,000 printers in the United States, I protest against the passage of this bill. It contracts work and injures their interests. On behalf of the 100,000 men employed in the paper manufacturing industries, I protest against its passage. It will lessen their output. On behalf of the thousands of pressmen, bookbinders, stitchers, and others employed in similar branches of industry, I protest against the passage of this bill. It is really a tariff on literature. It is an exaction from the boy who is thirsting for knowledge. When a boy, I picked up old iron and brass to raise money to buy a copy of Bourrienne's Napoleon. I had to work for three weeks before I got 47 cents' worth of the metals. The price of the book was 50 cents, and the bookseller (who, by the way, was a Methodist preacher) threw off the 3 cents. [Laughter.] He had more sympathy and humanity than is shown by the men who are advocating the passage of this bill. You can pick up Bourrienne's Napoleon now for 10 cents. They would increase it to 50.

Mr. CROWTHER. I will ask the gentleman from New York whether this proposed legislation is not an incubus upon intelligence.

whether this proposed legislation is not an incubus upon intelligence? [Laughter.] Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. CUMMINGS. Certainly it is. I am glad to have such a suggestion from a man who has stood at the case and set type. And I will allude to another printer to whom my friend and colleague Mr. Quigo referred to-day, Col. Thomas L. James, former Postmaster-General. Those of you who listened to the remarks

Postmaster-General. Those of you who listened to the remarks of that gentleman as read by my colleague will certainly benefit from them if your minds are in the right condition. [Laughter.]

This is the third time this bill has appeared in the House since I have been a Representative. It has been defeated twice by an overwhelming vote. It seems now that somebody is on a "still hunt" and is endeavoring to triumph through such methods. But the people are awake. I warn every man here who represents an agricultural district, with voters from 40 to 100 miles from a rail-road that his vote will be subjected to careful scrutiny. It is a road, that his vote will be subjected to careful scrutiny. It is a bill drawn in the interests of de luxe publishers. It is drawn in the interests of the express companies; and "don't you forget it."

[Laughter.] It is a bill not entitled to the support even of the economists of the House-and I am looking at one of the most economists of the House—and I am looking at one of the most celebrated of them as I talk [laughter]—a gentleman [Mr. Cannon] who was implicated in the passage of the law as it now stands, who stood up for it and advocated it. He saw no "abuses" in it then, and he knew what it meant. The "abuses" have been found since then. Under cover of one or two abuses you are trying to upset a law which has reduced the price of literature in this country, which has produced more books and created more circulating libraries than all other legislation since the foundation of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, let the Democratic side of the House remember that free literature ought to be inseparable from free trade. No Democrat at least ought to vote to put a tariff upon the literature of his own country.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back any time I may have remaining to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OGDEN. I should like to ask the gentleman from California—I mean New York—a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I once lived in California. I will answer the gentleman's question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Then I will talk with my friend in the cloakroom or elsewhere hereafter. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that anyone else is ready to go on with the discussion to-night. I move, therefore, that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4566) to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LOUD. I move that the House adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, leave of absence was granted as

To Mr. Pickler, for ten days, on account of important business. To Mr. HUFF, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. McRae, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family. To Mr. Graff, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family. To Mr. Dockery, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. HANLY, indefinitely, on account of important business.

and

A bill (H. R. 4281) granting an increase of pension to George Johnson, of Lenox, Iowa.

The motion of Mr. Loud, that the House adjourn, was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

THE LAS ANIMAS GRANT.

Mr. WHITE. The bill (S. 2007) to authorize the United States Court of Private Land Claims to hear, try, and determine the issues as to the extent and boundaries of the Las Animas grant, was introduced by me some time ago and referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Since that time I have learned that it was improperly referred and should have gone to the Committee on Private Land Claims. I have speaker to the senior member of the Private Land Claims. I have spoken to the senior member of the Committee on Public Lands with reference to it, and I believe there is no objection to its recall from that committee. I ask that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Private

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the change of reference indicated by the the Senator from California will be made.

IMPRISONMENT OF JULIO SANGUILLY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Florida [Mr. Call] coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr.

CALL, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to send to the Senate, either in open or secret session, as he may prefer, if, in his opinion, not incompatible with the public interest, all the correspondence and reports of the consul-general of the United States at Habana relating to the arrest, imprisonment, trial, and condemnation to perpetual imprisonment in chains of Julio Sanguilly, a citizen of the United States, by the authorities of Spain in Cuba.

Mr. President, there is another resolution upon the subject which was introduced yesterday. I desire them both to be considered by the Senate at the same time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution introduced yesterday by Mr. Call, as follows:

A joint resolution (S. R. 186) instructing the President to demand the release of Julio Sanguilly.

Whereas Julio Sanguilly, an American citizen, arrested in his home in Habana the day before the outbreak of the present insurrection, has been confined in his cell in the Cabanas prison for the past twenty-three months; and Whereas the lawyer who defended him in his first trial has also been imprisoned in said prison; and Whereas his principal witness, Lopez Coloma, was shot in said prison by order of the Spanish authorities immediately preceding the second trial of said Sanguilly; and Whereas the attorney who conducted the proceedings in the appeal before the authorities at Madrid has since been deprived of his office and emoluments attached thereto by the authorities at Madrid in consequence thereof; and

ments attached thereto by the authorities at Madrid in consequence thereof; and
Whereas the said Julio Sanguilly has been tried and condemned to perpetual imprisonment in chains, without evidence against him and without the opportunity of defense: Therefore,
Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be instructed to demand the immediate release of the said Julio Sanguilly with permission to return to the United States.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, there was laid before the Senate yesterday, under a resolution of the Senate, a message from the President transmitting a report from the Secretary of State accompanied by copies of correspondence of Consul-General Lee concerning the death of Charles Govin, a citizen of the United States, who, it is alleged, was captured without arms, without being engaged in the revolution, being there in the Island of Cuba merely as a reporter. It is stated that he was tied to a tree and chopped to pieces by the military forces of Spain. This report of the consul-general, communicated to the State Department, is from General Lee, which was made to the Senate yesterday, and was ordered to be printed. I had thought perhaps it was better that that report should be printed and in the hands of Senators before any consideration of these resolutions.

Mr. HARRIS. Govin was a citizen of the United States?

Mr. CALL. He was a citizen of the United States, the son of a former consul of the United States to Italy under one of the Republican Administrations, his father being a native of Cuba, but having left the Island of Cuba during the last revolution and becoming a citizen of the United States, resident in the State of Florida. This was his son, born in the United States, as I understand, and a citizen in the full sense of the term.

While I had intended to ask that the resolution lie over until the report was printed, I think I can state the contents of the report so clearly that when it is received here my statement will be verified by the report of the consul-general. The consul-general states in a demand upon the Governor-General of Cuba that eral states in a demand upon the Governor-General of Cuba that it is charged, upon information which is satisfactory to him, that this citizen of the United States was captured without arms, without being engaged in the military service of the insurgents in Cuba, without participation of any kind in the military operations being carried on there, and that he was deliberately tied to two trees and cut to pieces by the Spanish soldiers, piece by piece. The Governor-General replies, in forwarding the communication of the officer immediately in command—whose name I do not now remember—that Govin was wounded while engaged in a battle and that he died from his wounds. The consul-general of the United States replies that the information which he has received justifies him in the belief that this statement is not true.

In the report of the consul-general as submitted to the Senate there are eliminated from it by stars showing omissions the state-ments referred to by the consul-general of the United States as being extra-official. To this it is replied by the Governor-General that he should not take the unofficial statements of persons who were prejudiced against Spain, nor should they be made the sub-ject of a communication between friendly governments; that the United States can not make use of these unofficial statements contrary to the official statements of the officers of Spain in command. These statements referred to are not given in this report. It is possible that it may be considered by the Department of State and the President that it is inconsistent with the public interests in his

the President that it is inconsistent with the public interests in his judgment to communicate these statements. We can not tell in regard to that. The fact, however, appears from the stars contained in the report that there are omissions of papers referred to in the communication of the consul-general.

Mr. President, I propose to read a statement, and the Senate in the present state of this question must accept my statement that it comes from a person who is entirely reliable; from a person who has received high consideration from the American people in the shape of official promotions, who has been or will be a member of one of the branches of this Government—its legislative branch. The statement was dictated by this person. I will not give his name. I am not authorized to do so. I have no doubt it will appear in due time. But I will state to the Senate that this statement was dictated by a person of character; by a person who stands high in the consideration of all who know him.

STATEMENT IN RELATION TO CHARLES GOVIN.

On Wednesday morning, December 30, I visited the Cabanas, the political prison situated in the city of Habana, in company with Consul-General Fitzhugh Lee, and a clerk from his department, who acted as interpreter. By appointment made the previous day, General Lee was permitted to see the American prisoners confined in this prison. There were, I think, about eight or ten of these brought out. No Americans are permitted to see the American prisoners confined in this prison. There were, I think, about eight or ten of these brought out. No Americans are permitted to enter this prison and no one to see these prisoners except on Wednesdays and Saturdays, and then only upon giving twenty-four hours' notice to the authorities. These prisoners were brought out and, during the interview, were surrounded by a company of soldiers. I presume about one hundred, bearing arms under the command of the officers of the prison. These men stood in a group in the center and we were permitted to pass in through this line of soldiers and speak with them.

Amongst the prisoners was a young man who. I learned subsequently from a satisfactory source, was with Charles Govin, an American citizenty of the company of the capture of the Spanish soldiers about the fit a correspondent, who was captured by the Spanish soldiers about the fit a correspondent, who was captured by the Spanish soldiers about the fit a correspondent, who was captured by the Spanish soldiers have the fit and the exhibited marks on his arms and hands made by the ropes. They remained together all night. He stated that Govin was entirely without arms and was not engaged in the war in any way. The officer struck these from his hand at the time, and the next morning he was separated from the witness and the state men the witness, and also his credentials as an authorized newspaper correspondent. He also stated that he was without arms and was not engaged in the war in any way. The officer struck these from his hand at the time, and cell in the Casanas, where he had been imprisoned for a considerable time, and shot without any trial, as Sanguilly said, for the purpose of preventing him from testifying.

An appeal must be taken within a few days or unless the United States interferes the witness will be transported to the penal colony in North Africa in accordance with the sentence passed a few days ago. Sanguilly stated that he did not believe that he could get any lawyer to take his case and conduct his appeal, as the fate of his other two lawyers who conducted the former proceedings would deter others from undertaking his case again.

Sanguilly seems to be a man of about 60 years of age, quite gray, and complained that the imprisonment during the past twenty-three months was breaking his health so that he could not longer endure it: and he desired that the United States Government take action in his case at once by inquiring into the cause of his detention and the unfair method by which he has been tried and convicted. He claimed that there is no possible testimony as to his being implicated in the rebellion, but that he was simply confined because he might perhaps have been guilty of some offense in the future, but that he was guilty of no offense whatever when arrested, and nothing was proven or could be proven against him.

STATEMENT IN BELATION TO DR. BATTINCOURT.

On last Sunday night Dr. Battincourt, a man of 68 years of age, an American citizen, who has been for a number of years engaged in the practice of dentistry in the city of Habana. was arrested and thrown into prison. On Monday I saw his son, also an American citizen, at the American consulate, who made the following statement in substance:

When his father failed to return home on Saturday night, as was his custom, the housekeeper notified his son, who is married, and who lives in a different part of the city. The son immediately set out to find what had become of his father, and about 2 o'clock Sunday afternoon, upon making inquiry at the Spanish prisor in the city, he learned from the officer in charge that his father was in that prison in communicato—

That is, solitary confinement, not allowed to see or to have inter-ties immediately in charge of him—that is, no one will be permitted to speak to him, nor will he be permitted to communicate to anyone—and had been there from some time the night before.

He inquired if his father had had anything to eat, and the officer stated he had not. He then purchased a glass of milk and some cakes, and upon paying the officer half a dollar was permitted to send them by a subordinate of the prison in to his father. He asked if his father had a bed or chair to sit upon, and was told that he had nothing but a small bench. He returned at a later hour, and after waiting until about 7 o'clock in the evening and giving the officer $1.50 he was permitted to send his father a cot to lie upon He inquired for the charge upon which his father was taken and held, and could learn nothing of what the charge was. He requested the United States consul to communicate with the anthorities at the palace and ascertain why his father was detained and have him tried or set free. Up until the time of my departure at 1 o'clock on Wednesday no reply had been received from the palace in regard to this case.

Subsequently, in conversation with a young Cuban, also at the consulate, I learned that this young Cuban had been talking with Dr. Battincourt about 10 o'clock on Sunday evening, in front of the Hotel Inglaterra, in the park in front of which the military band was giving a concert, and the population generally had turned out, and that he had talked with the doctor for some time, in which the latter had stated that he was looking for a young man who he said was circulating a report about him that he was a Cuban sympathizer, and that he wished to see the young man and state to him that he was not in any way in sympathy with the Cuban cause and had neither spoken nor did anything of the kind. This was the last time the doctor was seen.

The son stated that his father was particularly careful about matters of this kind and had never said or done anything either in favor of the insurgents or the Spaniards. Whether he was taken on this charge or whether it was some other charge the American consultate was unable to learn up until the time of my departure on Wednesday.

The following resolution was given to me by a prominent citizen of the United States, who suggested that the attention of Congress should be called to it in this form:

"Whereas Julio Sanguilly, an American citizen, arrested in his home in Habana the day before the outbreak of the present insurrection, has been confined in his cell in the Cabanas prison for the past twenty-three months; and

"Whereas the lawyer who defended him in his first trial has also been imprisoned in said prison; and
"Whereas his principal witness, Lopez Coloma, was shot in said prison by order of the Spanish authorities immediately preceding the second trial of said Sanguilly, and
"Whereas the attorney who conducted the proceedings in the appeal before the authorities at Madrid has since been deprived of his office and emoluments attached thereto by the authorities at Madrid in consequence thereof;

ments attached thereto by the authorities at Madrid in consequence thereof; and

"Whereas the said Julio Sanguilly has been tried and condemned to perpetual imprisonment in chains, without evidence against him and without the opportunity of defense: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled. That the President of the United States be instructed to demand the immediate release of the said Julio Sanguilly, with permission to return to the United States."

The statements and the preamble of the above resolution were made by persons of character and veracity, and the evidence as submitted to me from such witnesses authorizes me to say that they are true. I am informed from reliable sources that evidence of the facts as above stated is to be found amongst the files of the State Department.

I am not at liberty to give the name. I state, however, that it is from a man who stands high in the country, a citizen of a Northern State, a Republican, a man who has been or will be con-nected at an early day with one of the departments of this Government of an important character. He has not authorized me to give his name, but I am satisfied it will be given in due time.

Mr. Sanguilly can not secure the services of any lawyer to prosecute his appeal, as the fate of his attorney who conducted his case in Habana—he being now in the prison in the Cabanas—and his attorney in Spain having been deprived of his office and emoluments, warns others not to assist him in his release from prison.

The American citizens in Habana are without protection, are subject to insults, and it is not safe for them to go about the city, and the need of imperative action on the part of our Government is manifest to all observers.

I have another letter from the wife of one of the prisoners who was captured on board the Competitor, a private sailor who was taken as a member of the crew of the Competitor, without any information or knowledge that he was bound for the coast of Cuba, and who has been repeatedly, during his long confinement for some months in the Cabanas, threatened with execution. This Amer-ican citizen, a common sailor on board this ship, in no way re-sponsible for the port to which she was bound, is held in confinement subject to execution and threatened with the penalty of death.

This is but one of a number of cases. Julio Sanguilly, a citizen of the United States, having the full privilege and character of citizenship, without any complicity whatever with the insurgents, without any evidence of any intention to join the military forces of Cuba, upon suspicion alone, was arrested at his home, his temporary place of residence, where he was residing under the pledge of the Governments of the United States and of Spain in their treaty that he should be permitted to enjoy the full protection of treaty that he should be permitted to enjoy the full protection of life and liberty and property. Twenty-three months ago he was incarcerated in a prison, and he was condemned to perpetual imprisonment in chains, violating the letter and the spirit of the treaty, which requires that to be tried by a military tribunal the person shall be captured with arms. In view of the former insurgent condition of the Island of Cuba, this treaty stipulation was made, and it was only upon the remonstrance of this Government that he was submitted to trial by what they call a civil tribunal, a tribunal under the civil law; and that tribunal, after appeal to Madrid to set aside the sentence, has condemned him to eight years Madrid to set aside the sentence, has condemned him to eight years of imprisonment in chains.

Govin, a citizen of the United States, having no intention, as he testified and as the circumstances indicate, of participating in the citizenship under our laws. They are protected under a treaty stipulation guaranteeing them safety of life, of liberty, and of property. The prisons of the Cabanas and Morro Castle are full of them. They are stained with the blood of American citizens, as is exhibited by the facts stated in this report of the consul-general and by statements from a reliable source. It only needs that this body shall investigate carefully the fact in order that the this body shall investigate carefully the fact in order that the cover may be taken off from this scene of butchery.

Mr. President, the government that fails to protect its citizens in their lives, their liberty, and their property in foreign lands, to which they have a right to go under treaty stipulations, justly incurs the execration of mankind. A great Republic of 80,000,000 people, denying to its imprisoned citizens appealing to it to preserve the obligations of the treaty, and the pledge for their protection, sentenced to perpetual imprisonment in chains, hesitating as to the course it should pursue, presents a spectacle to the world discreditable not only to this great representative of freedom and discreditable not only to this great representative of freedom and individual rights, but to every government that claims to be sovreign and independent.

It is idle, Mr. President, to say that these things are not true.

They are true. I am informed by this statement that the facts are upon the files of the Department of State, and if they were not that proof could easily be obtained.

The reply is made to this demand, to this appeal from innecent citizens in confinement under the authority of Spain, in resolutions of boards of trade and of meetings in the country sent here, that it will disturb trade, it will interrupt commerce, it will produce a decline of the great staples of agriculture—and that Sanguilly shall remain in chains, that American citizens imprisoned in these fortresses shall be allowed to stay there, because, perchance, in the assertion of right, in the enforcement of treaty obligations, war might occur.

Mr. President, trade is not preserved by the neglect to enforce treaty stipulations for the protection of the lives and the liberty and the property of American citizens. Commerce is not preserved and left undisturbed by the permission of slaughter and of arbitrary imprisonment of our citizens engaged in commerce in foreign lands. Trade and commerce at home can not be preserved in prosperity and successfully if we neglect the obligations of our Government to our citizens abroad. If there were no question of Government to our citizens abroad. If there were no question of patriotism, if this god of business is to be allowed to suppress the sentiments of humanity, to suppress the demands of religion, to suppress the manhood and courage of our people, if we were to take this low ground and say that cowardice, the lack of public spirit, was to be preferred to the danger of war, it would be an unwise and ruinous policy. There can be no prosperity in a country where there is no sense of patriotism and national honor, where the name American citizen becomes a reproach and does where the name American citizen becomes a reproach and does not carry withit the sanction of protection to his life, his property, and his business. Upon every ground of patriotism, of self-respect, of the future character of this great people, of humanity, of civilization, and Christianity, this Government should demand the release of Julio Sanguilly and of all American citizens who have been captured without arms in their hands and without full and fair evidence of complicity with the insurgent movement in Cuba.

What answer can be made to that proposition? A denial of the facts. And that denial must rest upon the assumption that these statements are untrue, upon the assumption that the consul-general in the report which he has made here in the case of Govin—that the statements as to the manner of his death as given by the Spanish authorities are not true, but that the statements which are unofficially given are true. What a spectacle is presented when we become parties to this false assertion to cover up the murder, the brutal murder, of an American citizen.

Mr. President, the objection is made and published and circulated in the newspapers-I have one here from New York in the Advertiser—that the great powers of Europe will intervene to aid Spain in a war to be declared upon the United States if peradventure we should exercise the sovereign right which we have of recognizing the existence of a de facto government as an independent and sovereign government.

Mr. President, it is an unreasonable proposition. It can not be There is no ground of public law, there is no precedent in the customs of nations, for the declaration of war as a ground of right—though as a ground of policy there may have been—upon a nation recognizing the existence of an actual power, a power which testified and as the circumstances indicate, of participating in the war in any capacity, a newspaper reporter, having a right under the treaty with Spain and under the pledge and guaranty of protection of this Government to go into the Island of Cuba, was arrested, tied to a tree, and brutally chopped to pieces by the soldiery, and the fact deliberately concealed and denied.

Mr. President, the case of Julio Sanguilly is but a type of what is occurring to hundreds of American citizens. What matters it that they were natives of Cuba? What matters it that they reside in the Island of Cuba? That is their right. They have acquired the interior of that island has been (except the soil actually occupied by the forces of Spain) in the control and subject to the jurisdiction of the Cuban forces, claiming to be a Republic and organized as a Republic.

But if it were so, if the great powers of Europe, if the monarchs of Europe should consolidate their power, should determine to make war upon the Republic of the United States because in the interest of suffering humanity, in the interest of civilization, in the interest of republican government, they have determined to exercise their power for these great ends, what effect would it have upon the masses of Europe? What effect would it have upon their own subjects? What statesman would be so unwise as to attempt to organize the power of monarchy, the power of imperialism, against this Republic standing in the interests of humanity and of right? No wise statesman, Mr. President, will do anything to inaugurate a struggle of this kind between the existing order of governments and the masses of the people, for it is easy to perceive that the sympathies of mankind, the sentiment of all Christian peoples, would be with this Republic in maintaining that which is right, that which they have a right to demand, and which they are bound to demand wherever a people assert their right to govern themselves successfully.

Have we not proclaimed to the world that governments exist by the just consent of the governed alone; that a people have inalienable rights of life, liberty, and property which every government must respect? Is that true or is it a falsehood? If it be true, have we no right to say that these rights must be respected, that they must not be destroyed, and that if a people asserting for themselves these rights upon which we have founded our Government assert them successfully for any considerable period of time, shall it be said that we are false to those pledges if we say to them, "We do not recognize that right for you which we have declared to be fundamental and the basis of government throughout the

Mr. President, there is no danger, and these considerations evidence that there is no danger, of any combination of European powers against this Republic. There is no advocacy of war in these propositions; there is no disrespect to the Spanish Government. Its methods in Cuba have marked the long period of its decadence. They have been the same causes that have led to that subordination of the great power of Spain from being the head of the European powers to being the least powerful amongst them now. There is no disrespect to her to say that the people of Cuba, who for so many years have followed the example of Mexico and the South American Republics, have found that the form of government given them by Spain did not answer their purposes, that it was not in accordance with their sentiments under the example of this American Republic, and that they have adopted as true that which we have proclaimed to the people of the world and asserted for ourselves. Is it any disrespect to Spain to say that in this long period of decay which has marked her public career it is to be attributed to the attempt to maintain a colonial subjection of these distant empires, to point to the difference between England and her colonial system of free government, and to say that now, when you have so incensed the population that they will not tolerate the idea, when, catching the example of successful revolution from the vast empires upon this hemisphere, they are penetrated with this idea, and you can not subdue it, and you must not subdue it by these barbarous methods, is it any disrespect to that Government to say that we are compelled to recognize as a fact an organized power which has successfully maintained itself and to recognize as a fact that these methods which you have pursued toward these American citizens are methods which render it impossible for you to succeed?

zens are methods which render it impossible for you to succeed? The suggestion, Mr. President, is without foundation that in this age any combination of European powers can deliberately assert that they will make war upon a people for recognizing the independence of another people who have successfully maintained that independence for several years when that assertion of their right to independence rests upon causes that are manifestly right, to wit, the impossibility of good government over that island from a country so far distant and in the conditions which exist there. The wise friend of Spain, Mr. President, the wise statesman in Spain, the counselor whose judgment should be followed, would be he who would say: "Sever these relations; go on and reassert for yourself the qualities which have made you great amongst the nations of the earth; proceed to establish the policies which will restore the spirit that characterized this nation when she was foremost among the nations of Europe; again reestablish your industries, cultivate the love of letters and of learning which at one time filled the University of Salamanca with 4,000 students, and again enter upon a course of prosperity with lighter taxation. Look to Africa if you wish to extend your colonial domination, not here, to a people imbittered and estranged by methods of government which would produce revolution anywhere, by arbitrary power vested in single persons far removed from the control of the Government of Spain, subjecting the lives, the property, the everything of these people to the caprice of one man, of a soldier, perhaps a man indifferent to human suffering, and thus subjecting them, without trial, without tribunals, without reasonable processes of law, but being taken upon suspicion and condemned to perpetual imprisonment in chains.

It seems to me that we are degenerating in the character of our people and in the character of our Government; that we are going back some centuries when we fail to have courage, to have patriotism, to have Christianity, to have civilization, to have a sense of justice and right sufficient to demand, and imperatively demand, the release of American citizens held in captivity and condemned to chains upon suspicion without evidence, and then talk about delay. Mr. President, this is no new thing. The blood of the soldiers and the men of the Virginius will remind us that it is not a matter of to-day, as will the slaughter of the students in Cuba for the attempted mutilation of a statue, the shooting of sixteen boys to suppress the spirit of revolt and discontent. It would seem as if the manhood of the American people was disappearing. Are 80,000,000 people, the most powerful in the world, with institutions framed upon the declaration that a people have a just cause to assert their right of self-government, to permit Julio Sanguilly to be held in chains for suspicion that he sympathized with the insurgents, and without evidence to permit Govin to be tied to a tree and cut to pieces deliberately and the fact concealed?

Mr. President, there can be no prosperity, there can be no respect among the nations of the earth for a government that fails to protect the lives and the liberty of its citizens under treaty obligations. The spectacle is one that belittles the people of the United States and their Government in the consideration of the nations of the world, and ought to belittle it.

The idea of disturbing trade! What trade will there be when the name of American citizen is a word of reproach, when Govin is permitted to be cut to pieces and Julio Sanguilly to be taken from his bed and condemned by a military tribunal, in violation of the very words of the treaty, and then sentenced to eight years' imprisonment in chains after the reversal of his sentence by the supreme tribunal?

The Island of Cuba lies immediately upon our shores, but that is no reason, as has been stated, why she should be independent unis no reason, as has been stated, why she should be independent unless that independence is accomplished by peaceable measures or by force of her own. That is no reason why we should interfere. That island is capable of being a place where a vast portion of our population, unemployed, may find profitable employment; it is capable of sustaining 10,000,000 people. These are considerations which would point to the peaceable negotiation of this Government for the catablishment of a progression of this covernment. ment for the establishment of a proper government there; but surely, Mr. President, when these people have asserted for them-selves a government of their own, when they have maintained it for more than two years, aye, for three years, when they have, in every shape and form, asserted a power of governing themselves, surely that is a reason why we, having greater interests than other people, we, knowing that it is impossible to prevent the overflow of this great population into the adjacent countries; we, knowing that perpetual disturbance will continue and can not be suppressed because of the enterprise and adventure of American citizens crossing in a few hours a narrow channel; we, knowing that peaceable relations with the foreign Government of Spain itself demand that a free government should be established in Cuba, not asking nor seeking to assert power over it, knowing that there will be perpetual discord, and knowing that the people of the United States will not permit to pass unnoticed the murder of American citizens under the methods which have been pursued in Cuba in relation to Govin and in relation to Sanguilly; knowing that this people will not consent that women shall be put to death, children murdered and outraged; knowing that the sentiment of the American people is one of manhood and character, and that they will not be patient spectators of such things—are not these considerations which should address themselves to the minds of statesmen? How long will it be before these facts will so arouse the American people that no power can stay them from passing in such multitudes, even without the sanction of this Government, into any adjacent country that may be open to them. Mr. President, the Navy of the United States and all its armed force could not prevent, nor could the combined powers of the world, not only the American people, but the brave men of every country, if the war in Cuba progresses, from going to the support of any government which may be established there as a protest against despotism.

Instead of the Monroe doctrine of republicanism, have we gone back to the assertion of imperialism upon this continent, to the establishment of arbitrary government? Is that the progress of public opinion in this country?

The people of the State which I have the honor in part to represent are very closely connected with the people of Cuba. There is a constant intercourse going on. Many of the Cubans are educated; are a people of a high order of intelligence; many of them have been persons of large wealth. I am informed that there are very few native Cubans who are not engaged in the present rebellion. Sanguilly happened to be one of those who was not so engaged. Ten years ago he was a general of the insurgent army in Cuba, but he laid down his arms under an arrangement made with the Governor-General of Cuba and accepted the amnesty and He was guaranteed complete absolution from his offense, and he became a citizen of the United States and resided in this country. Naturally his connections carried him back among his own people, not to become a Spanish subject, but to remain there quietly and contentedly. He had the right to do so. We extended naturalization to him without limit or restraint. He went back to Cuba, and what was the result? Within the Spanish lines in the city of Habana, in his own house, without a witness against him, without evidence of any complicity in the rebellion, in full loyalty to this Government and to its obligations to Spain that our citizens should not engage in armed insurrection, with the full right to his own opinions, he was arrested and is now in He appeals to this Government and to $0,000,000 American people to release him and protect his life and the lives of other Americans who are confined in Cuba, and to let him return to the

I hope, Mr. President, that this question will not be postponed, that it will not be buried, that we shall have no more of these idle declarations of the disturbance of trade and business or the depreciation of the great staples of agriculture in the face of the fact that they can only rise and maintain their value when our com-merce is extended, when the relations of trade with other countries to this are properly adjusted, when we can exchange our products for the products of other countries—this idle declaration that we shall not protect American citizens and enforce treaty obligations because, perchance, there may be war with Spain, an impossible thing, or that there may be war with the great powers of monarchy in Europe, an impossible event; war to preserve monarchy against a Republic asserting its right to recognize another Republic and not interfering at all with Spain's power to

Mr. President, there is no law of civilized nations which permits the Spanish Government to hold as criminals men captured on board vessels carrying munitions of war to Cuba for insurgent There is no law of nations which permits the Spanish purposes. There is no law of nations which permits the Spanish Government to murder even the Cuban insurgents who are cap-Government to murder even the cuban insurgents who are captured in battle. By every custom of every civilized nation they have the right to be held as prisoners of war. That was our custom in the late civil war. We killed no prisoners because they were soldiers in the Confederate army. We outraged no women, we destroyed the lives of no children because they were found within the insurgent States. Why, then, should this body hesitate? Why, should an organized movement be carried on through Why should an organized movement be carried on throughtate? Why should an organized movement be carried on throughout the United States, from some central point, in the interest of Spain, by resolutions of boards of trade, that Sanguilly shall remain in chains; that the Govin butchery shall be concealed; that the walls of the fortresses of Spain shall not be cleansed of the blood of innocent Americans slain without a pretext of conformity with the laws of war between civilized nations? Yet it is true that setting is delayed in this body. It is true that for that action is delayed in this body. It is true that for two years there have been repetitions of the massacre of the passengers on the Virginius, repetitions of the slaughter of students in Habanainnocent noncombatants-and the whole force of the United States being directly used to protect and continue that condition of

Mr. President, the Government of Great Britain is justly esteemed throughout the world, because the Englishman can say, "The power of Great Britain surrounds me here." He can say what the captain of the little war ship said when he demanded that all British subjects taken upon board the Virginius should be returned on board his vessel before the sun sets. The answer was made that "the forces present are sufficient to destroy and blow your vessel into atoms." He made the proud reply, "But they are not sufficient to blow the Kingdom of Great Britain out of the water, nor to destroy the British Empire. I demand that before the sun sets every British subject shall be placed on the decks of this ship under the English flag." While our American citizens were slaughtered, the subjects of Great Britain were surcitizens were slaughtered, the subjects of Great Britain were sur-rendered and placed under the English flag. What an example to us! How idle to talk about suppressing this sentiment of the American people or of any civilized country! How long would England stand it if one of her subjects, having produced his papers of citizenship, which are struck from his hand with con-tempt, were tied to a tree and cut to pieces, having committed no offense, upon suspicion that he was going to engage with the insurgent forces? How long would England stand it if one of her subjects were taken upon suspicion, and, without fair trial, without witnesses, were held in confinement for twenty-three months and sentenced by a military tribunal to perpetual imprisonment in Spain? If, later, that sentence were changed to eight years, as in the case of Sanguilly, how long would she stand it?

The relations of the people of Florida to the Island of Cuba are such as to bring to their notice these cases, and to bring to their notice the condition of feeling that exists among the people of Cuba, the intelligent portion of the people of Cuba, the men of character, and there are men of character, there are men of intelligence, there are men of education amongst them. The sentiment which pervades the people of the State of Florida is almost universal in favor, not of the annexation of the island, but of universal in favor, not of the annexation of the island, but of those people having a government based upon the principles of humanity, in favor of a government which shall protect the lives and liberty of the people, which shall advance the prosperity of the island, which shall furnish a place where the enterprising American can engage in business. That he will go, that they will be found there by the ten thousand in the near future, there can be no doubt.

While we do not advocate nor desire war, we are satisfied that there are worse things than war. If any part of the country be exposed to the possible chances of injury in a condition of war, it would be the peninsula of Florida, but her people are courageous, her people are a Christian people, her people sympathize with the progress of mankind, with liberal institutions, with republican governments, with patriotism, with the sentiment which would make the Stars and Stripes the symbol of power and protection to the citizen of the United States wherever the sun shines.

Mr. President, I ask that the resolution requesting information may now be adopted.

may now be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution submitted by the Senator from Florida.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. The joint resolution which I introduced was prepared by an eminent citizen in Habana who is cognizant of all the facts connected with the case, a man of high character. It reflects the opinions, the feeling, and the judgment of a man whose name, if I were permitted to disclose it, would carry conviction with it everywhere. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I hope for speedy action in the matter

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I move that the Senate go into executive session to consider two treaties which the committee desire to have considered.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

SIOUX RESERVATION IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 3328) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I will state in explanation of the bill that it simply relates to lands opened to settlement on the Great Sioux Reservation. It is to obviate double payment for the land. lands were opened to settlement, and the settlers were required, if they commuted or paid for the land at the end of fourteen months' residence, to pay the Indian price. The bill does not relieve them from that payment. But afterwards Congress passed an act inadvertently, not intended to apply to those lands, which now requires the settlers to make two payments. It compels them not only to pay the Indians, but to pay the Government $1.25 an acre.

I have in this connection a letter from the Interior Department which I desire to have read, as it explains the whole matter. The bill was unanimously reported from the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested. The Secretary read as follows:

The Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 9, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of December 5, 1896, requesting information as to the ruling requiring homestead settlers on lands formerly embraced in Indian reservations to pay the Government for the land in addition to the payment required for the benefit of the Indians, as you desire to have the law amended, if an amendment is required for the relief of the homestead settlers.

In reply I have to state that the only requirement of the nature indicated pertains to the lands formerly embraced in the Great Sioux Reservation in the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, and Nebraska.

These lands were opened to settlement and entry under the provisions of the act of March 2, 1899 (25 Stat., 889).

Said act provides that the lands "shall be disposed of by the United States to actual settlers only under the provisions of the homestead law (except section 2301 thereof) and under the laws relating to town sites: Provided, That each settler under and in accordance with the provisions of said homestead acts shall pay to the United States for the land so taken by him, in addition to the fees provided by law, the sum of $1.25 per acre for all lands disposed of within the first three years after the taking effect of this act, and the sum of 51 cents per acre for all lands disposed of within the lirst three years after the taking effect of this act, and the sum of 51 cents per acre for all lands disposed of within the lirst three years after the taking effect of this act, and the sum of 51 cents per acre for all lands disposed of within the lirst three years after the taking effect of this act, and the sum of 51 cents per acre for all lands disposed of 51 cents per acre for all lands disposed of 51 cents per acre for all lands disposed of 51 cents per acre for all lands disposed of 51 cents per acre for all lands disposed of 51 cents per acre for all lands disposed of 51 ce thereafter, and 50 cents per acre for the residue of the lands then undisposed of, and shall be entitled to a patent therefor according to said homestead laws, and after the full payment of said sums."

It will be noticed that under said act no commutation of homestead entries laws, and after the full payment of said sums."

It will be noticed that under said act no commutation of homestead entries was permissible.

Section 6 of the act of March 3, 1891 (23 Stat. 1095), which amended section 2301, United States Revised Statutes, relating to commutation of homestead entries, provided:

"And the provisions of this section shall apply to lands on the ceded portions of the Sioux Reservation by act approved March 2, 1889, in South Dakota, but shall not relieve said settlers from any payments now required by law."

Under date of May 13, 1895 (22 L. D., 550), the honorable Secretary, having under consideration the application of the State of South Dakota. "for 5 per cent of the net proceeds of sales of lands within the boundaries of what is known as the opened portion of the Great Sioux Reservation," held that the provisions of section 6 of the act of March 3, 1891 (supra), "clearly recognizes the trust character of the payments originally required of entrymen of Sioux lands, and means that when such entrymen so elect, they may commute, after the time named, by paying the minimum price for the land, in addition to the payments required under the act of 1889."

In view of the honorable Secretary's decision, the district land officers having jurisdiction over the Sioux lands were instructed, by letter C of June 23, 1893, to collect from parties applying to commute homesteads for said lands $1.25 per acre, in addition to the payments required under the act of March 2, 1899 (supra), and similar action was taken on all cases pending in this office unpatented.

Homestead settlers who make ordinary five-year proof are not affected by said ruling, which applies only to commuted homestead entries.

Very respectfully,

E. F. BEST, Assistant Commissioner.

Hon. R. F. Pettigrew, United States Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPOINTMENTS BY BREVET.

Mr. SEWELL. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3719) to provide for appointment by brevet of active or retired officers of the United States Army.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Millitary Affairs with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "war," to strike out "shall" and insert "may, at the discretion of the President;" so as to make the bill

Be it enacted, etc., That all officers of the Regular Army of the United States, active or retired, who served in the volunteer forces during the late war may, at the discretion of the President, receive a brevet in the Regular Army equal to the highest rank held or the highest brevet received in the said volunteer forces and be commissioned accordingly as of the date of such brevet: Provided, That they have not already received a brevet of equal or higher grade in the Regular Army.

The amendment was agreed to

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if the bill carries any increased compensation in any shape, manner, or form?

Mr. SEWELL. In no shape, manner, or fashion. It gives nothing. It is purely honorary, and at the discretion of the President.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no possibility by which they can have increased pay by reason of this commission?

Mr. SEWELL. Oh, no; not at all. There are only about seventy any way who will be liable to appointment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. FLORENCE E. MAYBRICK.

Mr. HOAR. There is on the Calendar a joint resolution (S. R. 129) requesting the Government of Great Britain to pardon Mrs. Florence E. Maybrick as an act of magnanimity. The joint resolution was referred to the Judiciary Committee and unanimously reported adversely, but put upon the Calendar because it was supposed there might be some desire on the part of the Senator who introduced it to address the Senate. However, I believe he has no such desire, and I move that the joint resolution lie upon the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HOAR. Well, I do not care which course is taken. I do not want to have it kept upon the Calendar, where one will have to watch for it

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be indefinitely postponed.
Mr. HOAR. Very well.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps I ought to state that the reason why I did mr. HOAR. Perhaps I ought to state that the reason why I did not move the indefinite postponement was because the Senator from Florida [Mr. Call] was not in his seat. Upon his return to the Chamber, if he should desire a different disposition made of the joint resolution, I shall not wish to take advantage of his

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The first case will be called.

The bill (S. 2454) restoring the Santee Sioux Indians, of Nebraska, and the Flandreau Sioux Indians, of South Dakota, formerly known as and being a confederacy of the Medawakanton and Wapakoota Sioux Indians, to all rights, privileges, and benefits enjoyed by them and their ancestors under the treaties of 1837 and 1851, and for other purposes, was announced as the first bill on the Calendar.

Mr. COCKRELL. In the absence of the Senator who reported

Mr. PETTIGREW. I think the bill had better go over under Rule VIII, without prejudice. It is rather an important measure, and I think perhaps it should be taken up when it can receive more consideration than is possible at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be

The bill (S. 1781) making an appropriation to furnish flags for the schoolhouses of the District of Columbia was announced as next in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of next in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $1,000 for the purpose of purchasing United States flags to be floated over every public schoolhouse in the District of Columbia on school days and during school hours, the sum to be expended by and under the supervision of the school trustees of the District and to become available immediately on the passage of this act.

FREE HOMESTEADS IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 3656.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3656) providing for free homesteads on the public lands in Oklahoma Territory for actual and bona fide settlers, and reserving the public lands for that purpose.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The bill has been read at length, and I should now like to have the amendments read.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to hear the report of the minority of the committee. The report of the majority was read, but not the report of the minority. I think perhaps it would be better to have the amendments read first and then the report. I shall call for the reading of the first part of the report of the majority.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendments reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

The Secretary. In section 1, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the words "in the Territory of Oklahoma," and at the end of line 15 to add the following proviso:

Provided, however, That all sums of money so released, which if not released would belong to any Indian tribe, shall be paid to such Indian tribe by the United States;

So as to make the section read:

That all settlers under the homestead laws of the United States upon the public lands acquired by treaty or agreement from the various Indian tribes, who have or who shall hereafter reside upon the tract entered in good faith for the period required by existing law, shall be entitled to a patent for the land so entered, upon the payment to the local land officers of the usual and customary fees, and no other or further charge of any kind whatsoever shall be required from such settler to entitle him to a patent for the land covered by his entry: Provided, That the right to commute any such entry and pay for said lands, in the option of any such settler and in the time and at the prices now fixed by existing laws, shall remain in full force and effect: Provided, however, That all sums of money so released, which if not released would belong to any Indian tribe, shall be paid to such Indian tribe by the United States: Provided, That the public land laws of the United States are hereby suspended until further legislation by Congress, in so far as they may affect the territory hitherto known as Green County, Tex.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Missouri to ask for the reading of the minority report.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, sir. I understood the Senator in charge of the bill to ask for the reading of a part of the majority report.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I ask that the majority report be read to the annexed documents which accompany it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report as indicated by the Senator from South Dakota will be read.

The Secretary read the report (which appears in Senate proceedings of December 21, 1896).

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The views of the minority of the committee will now be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

VIEWS OF THE MINORITY.

The undersigned, a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, being unable to concur in the report of the majority of said committee upon the bill (H. R. 3656) providing for free homesteads on the public lands of Oklahoma Territory for actual and bona fide settlers, and reserving the public lands for that purpose, submits herewith briefly his reasons for suggesting that the bill ought not to pass:

Commencing with the year 1889, the Government of the United States has purchased, by agreement with the Indians, portions of their reservations, added them to the public domain, and opened the same to settlement, to the extent of 33,252,540 acres of land. For these lands it has paid or obligated itself to pay $25,261,937.95, not including payment for the Great Sioux Reservation, $9,053,985; the Colville Reservation, $1,500,000, and the Chippewa Reservation, $5,028,447; in all, $15,590,382, which by the terms of the agreements, were mainly to be paid for from the amount realized upon the disposal of the lands.

ervation, $5,028,447; in all, $15,580,382, which, by the terms of the agreements, were mainly to be paid for from the amount realized upon the disposal of the lands.

As a condition of the cession of the Great Sioux Reservation, it was, however, provided that $3,000,000 should be set apart in the Treasury as a trust fund for the benefit of the Indians. This sum of $3,000,000 should, it is thought, be added to the amount of money expended for the purchase of such Indian lands as above stated, making in all $28,201,937.95.

Each of the different acts passed providing for the opening of said lands to settlement contains a provision that the agricultural lands shall be opened and settled under the provisions of the homestead act, with the further requirement that each settler shall, in addition to compliance with the requirement that each settler shall, in addition to compliance with the requirements of the homestead act, pay a certain stipulated sum per acre for the land at the expiration of five years' residence in order to obtain a patent therefor, a different price per acre being fixed in the several statutes, sufficient to reimburse the Government when all the land shall be finally disposed of for the amount paid the Indians in order to obtain from them such cessions of the land. A large portion of the lands thus opened to settlement has been settled upon, but the undersigned have been unable to obtain information as to the precise number of acres which have been thus occupied by settlers. Various statutes have been passed extending the time for final payment upon representation of the settlers that on account of drought and from other causes it was hard for them to make the required payment at the end of their five years' residence. Some of these statutes apply only to single reservations, but the last two Indian appropriation bills have each contained a clause extending the time in all instances for one year. Thus the time of final payment for all of said lands has been extended until the full period of seve paid by the settlers. If this amendment should be adopted and the bill pass, the Government would be called upon to pay in the future, including the amount not yet due on the Cherokee Outlet purchase, a sum approximating $15,000,000.

has do the sections. It has amendment should be adopted and the bill pass, the Government would be called upon to pay in the future, including the amount not yet due on the Cherokee Outlet purchase, a sum approximating $15,000,000.

It is proper to remark here that negotiations are now in progress for the purchase of other lands embraced in other reservations with a view to opening them for settlement upon the same terms with regard to the reimbursement of the Government which have been prescribed in the clases already alluded to. In the Indian appropriation bill of last year the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to appoint a commission to treat with Indians for the cession of portions of the Crow and Flathead Indian Reservation in the State of Montana, with the Fort Hall Reservation Indians in Indaho, with the Uintah Reservation Indians in the State of Utah, and the Yakima Indians in the State of Washington, which commission was appointed and is now negotiating with the Indians. In addition, there are pending in Congress bills to ratify and confirm agreements already made with Indians for the purchase and cession of lands as follows: Agreement with the Turtle Mountain Band of the Chippewa Indians in the State of North Dakota, with the Indians of the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation in Wyoming, of the Comanche, Kiowa, and Apache tribes of Indians in Oklahoma Territory, with the Lower Pend d'Orefile or Calispel Indians in Washington, and with the indians of Pyramid Lake and Walker River Reservation in Nevada. The number of acres of land affected by unratified agreements already made and by the negotiations of the commission heretofore alluded to can not be specified by the undersigned, nor the amount of purchase money involved, but may be generally stated as amounting to several millions.

All negotiations and agreements for such cessions have been made or are being conducted upon the understood policy of the Government that it shall be reimbursed for the amounts to be paid from the proceeds arising fro

The bill under consideration has been given, in common phrase, an attractive name. An alleged "free-home" bill appeals to a certain sentiment that has heretofore found acceptance in the enactment of our homestead law, and the contention of the majority of the committee is that no discrimination should be made between the settlement of the lands to which the homestead act applied and the lands acquired as heretofore stated.

The committee says:

"The contention of your committee is that the application of the homestead law is that there should be no discrimination—that it should be applied to every portion of the public domain and to all the people who go out to subdue the wilderness. The argument that these lands were bought for a price from the Indians and that it was provided that the ultimate white owners of the land should compensate the General Government for its outlay has been given due consideration. The only possible conclusion, within lines of equity, is that the provision was an erroneous one and that its elimination from the statutes has been already too long delayed."

With this view the undersigned is entirely unable to agree. The public domain as it existed at the time of the passage of the homestead law, and upon which land was given to settlers in tracts of 160 acres after five years residence and cultivation without payment to the Government, was not acquired primarily to supply settlers with land. Territorial and political considerations mainly dictated the policy of obtaining the lands by purchase from and treaty with other nations. At the time of acquiring the same very large portions of said lands were not supposed to be adapted to or capable of cultivation. The statesmen of those days could scarcely have contemplated the possibility that they would ever be occupied by settlers for agricultural purposes. The acquisition of the same and payment for the same had thus been made in the first instance almost entirely without reference to any need that might ever exist that they should furnish h

It is probably not too much to say that not one of the agreements made with the Indians ceding their lands would have been ratified, and not an act opening them for settlement would have been passed if it had not been thoroughly understood and agreed that the settlers upon these lands should reimburse the Government for the amount expended by it to obtain them. The obligation of the settler to pay the Government the price stipulated is as definite, well understood, and binding as the obligation of any Government debtor. While we do not question the policy of our homestead laws, we insist that in relation to these lands, purchased and opened upon the demand of the settlers, it was right that another policy should be adopted. The attractive idea of free homes for the people was all very well while the Government had lands acquired for political and territorial reasons which it could donate to them. The purchase of 160 acres and the donation of the same to a citizen is entirely another thing, and can be justified, in the opinion of the undersigned, upon no consideration of public policy or governmental duty. As well might the Government be called upon to buy lands from individual owners or syndicates and donate them as free homes to settlers, as to be called upon to buy lands from the Indians for such purpose. As well may the Government be called upon to relinquish to the persons who have taken up these lands under contract the amount which they stipulated to pay for the same.

The propriety and right of reimbursement of the Government for the sum paid in the extinguishment of Indian titles had been settled several years earlier than the passage of the first of these acts under consideration. In 1890 Congress found it necessary in dealing with the Ute Indians in Colorado, as the result of serious disturbances which there occurred, to remove them frem contact with the citizens of Colorado. And accordingly an act was passed in 1850 providing for the acquirement of the summer of large sum of money, somewhat uncertain the Government shall pay for the same from the money raised by taxation of the whole people, and then donate the lands thus acquired to individuals. Aside from being indefensible upon principle, the amount involved, it will be seen, is very much larger than any estimate heretofore made.

O. H. PLATT.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, the bill now under consideration, as amended by the Committee on Indian Affairs, provides that the lands embraced in Indian reservations where the Indian title has been extinguished since 1889 shall be subject to entry under the homestead law, and where the homesteader resides upon the land for five years, making it his continuous home and exclusive residence, he shall receive title to the same upon paying the land-office fee, no other payment being required. Under existing law these homesteaders are required to pay to the Treasury of the United States not only the fees, but also the price per acre which the Indians received for the land when their title was extinguished. This price ranges from 50 cents to $3.75 an acre. These lands are, however, subject to entry under the mineral laws of the United States where there is mineral.

This bill does not affect that provision, but requires that the land shall be purchased as other mineral land. It also provides that these lands may be entered under the town-site law, and that payment shall be made if so entered. It also provides that wherever any settler, having taken a homestead upon these lands, chooses to prove up and pay for the same after fourteen months' residence, he shall pay the Indian price, but where he resides upon the land the full five years, that residence and occupation and cultivation shall be equivalent to payment. The bill is therefore restoring these lands to entry under the homestead law and makirg its provisions apply to them the same as they have been applied to all the vast area which has been occupied by American citizens during the last thirty or forty years under the provisions of that

in fact, Mr. President, it has not been the custom of the Government to hold its public domain for the purpose of revenue, to strive to see how much money can be acquired on it, but, on the contrary, it has been the custom of the Government to extinguish the foreign and Indian title, to dispose of the land, and to encourage its occupation and settlement by the people of this a think the first homestead law passed by this Government was in the closing days of the last century, in 1795. In the early days of the Republic the public lands were disposed of by direct act of Congress. A settlement of people existed on the Ohio River near the Big Sandy River. Congress passed an act setting out 24,000 acres of land and providing that it should be divided amongst those settlers and patents issued to them on condition that within five years after the survey and allotment of the land they should take up their residences upon the allotments and reside continuously thereon for five years, and that if they failed to do so the title should revert to the Government.

Before the passage of the original homestead law in 1862, the Government had disposed by grants to individuals of more than 15,000,000 acres of the public domain. Beginning with the very earliest days of our history that has been followed up by the grant of 63,000,000 acres for military services in the different wars in which we have been engaged.

We have donated 30,000,000 acres for educational purposes to the different States, and also made other large grants to aid in the construction of canals and public works of different kinds, the building of roads, etc.

So it has been the policy of the Government to use its lands to develop and build up a new country. The theory of the homestead law was that if a man would go forward into the wilderness beyond civilization, beyond schools, where there were no roads, take his family, cultivate the soil and make it his permanent home, that would be considered to a supplement to a work and the behalf that would be regarded as equivalent to payment, and he should be entitled to the land.

This policy has been pursued since 1862 up to 1889, and the great States of the West have been built up under it. Millions of acres of public land have been disposed of. During the dark days of the war, in 1862, this Government was not too poor to encourage the occupation of the public domain by the hardy pioneers, and Uncle Sam was willing to give to each man a home who would go forward and subdue the wilderness. It seems to me at this late day to change this policy is turning back. Perhaps, Mr. President, it is in accord with the economic interest of the age that we should turn back, for already our census shows that 52 per cent of our people are without homes; already our census shows that the property of this country is accumulated in the hands of less than 250,000 people. The objection to this measure seems to come from that locality in this country where the people live who own the wealth; but I doubt, Mr. President, if it is wise to check the effort of our people to become independent landowners, and I believe that that policy, inaugurated and approved in the past, is one that we should pursue in the future. of public land have been disposed of. During the dark days of

In the early days of this country President Jackson, in his annual message to Congress in 1832, said:

The wealth and strength of a country are in its population, and the best part of the population are the cultivators of the soil. Independent farmers are everywhere the basis of society and the true friends of liberty. * * *

To put an end forever to all partial and interested legislation on the subject, and to afford every American citizen of enterprise the opportunity of securing an independent freehold, it seems to me, therefore, best to abandon the idea of raising a future revenue out of the public lands.

Now, Mr. President, we do not propose to change the policy which has heretofore existed as to the disposal of the public lands, but we do propose by this legislation to make that policy apply to those areas recently purchased.

I want to say, in this connection, that hope of revenue from this source, if this bill does not pass, will be a disappointment. These lands are in the semiarid area of this country, where the rainfall is inadequate to produce crops for more than half of the seasons.

is inadequate to produce crops for more than half of the seasons. These people went out upon these lands believing that they were like the lands of Iowa, Minnesota, and Illinois, fit to be cut up into small farms; but they have found that it is impossible to raise the money to pay for them.

I will review very briefly, Mr. President, the reservations in my own State. Take the Great Sioux Reservation. Eight and one-half million acres were opened up to settlement under the provisions of the homestead law in 1889, but only 700,000 acres have been entered. The remainder of that land is high prairie, the ridges between the streams only fit for grazing, and will not be entered under any provisions of the homestead law. By the passage of this legislation we can relieve and retain in that country the people who have already entered 700,000 acres; but if you fail to pass it, you simply drive them from their homes to crowd the ranks of the idle and unoccupied people all over this country. They can not produce upon those lands money enough to pay for them. But those people who are there have begun to raise stock. While agriculture does not flourish, they have begun to store water from the storms and to raise gardens, and if they are relieved from the payment required from them under existing law they will remain the total but if the part of develop and build up that experts to be the part of the payment between the payment required from them under existing law they will remain the payment required from them under existing law they will remain the payment required from them under existing law they will remain the payment required from them under existing law they will remain the payment required from them under existing law they will remain the payment required from them under existing law they will remain the payment required from them under existing law they will remain the payment required from the payment required from the payment required from the payment payment required from the payment payment required from the pay from the payment required from them under existing law they from the payment required from them under existing law they will remain there to develop and build up that country; but if the Government forecloses its claim upon these people, it will simply drive them from their homes. You can drive them from their homes on the land they now occupy, and the rest of these reservations will be simply occupied by the great cattle kings, whose cattle already roam over that land. No one will buy the land, as the Senator from Minnesota suggests. If the Government wishes to dispose of that land to obtain revenue for it, then you must make some other provision than the provisions of the homestead law: you must make provision for its appraisal and for its sale. law; you must make provision for its appraisal and for its sale. If the Government is ready to adopt that policy in order to acquire revenue, you must lease the land for the only purpose for which it is fit to be used.

The report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office figures the revenue from these reservations as between four and five ures the revenue from these reservations as between four and five million dollars; while, on the contrary, the revenue will be practically nothing. The people who live there will leave and no others will come under the provisions of the homestead law. It is for these people that I plead.

Mr. President, the counties adjoining these reservations in my State lost 18,000 in population between the years 1890 and 1895. While the State itself gained slightly in population, the people left the lands in the vicinity of these reservations because they were mortgaged and unable to pay the interest.

were mortgaged and unable to pay the interest.

I recollect an incident which occurred there. A citizen of the State of New Hampshire held a mortgage of $600 on a quartee section of these lands near the Great Sioux Reservation. Hr thought he would go out to the Dakotas, as the debtor had failed to pay the interest for two years, to see what was the trouble. This citizen of New Hampshire visited my State, drove 12 miles from the railroad station to see the farm upon which he held a mortgage and of which he was very liable to become the proprietor. He found a small house, one story in height, with two rooms, and a sod barn near by, three cows picketed out and two rooms, and a sod barn near by, three cows picketed out and grazing not far away, a young woman, and two young children. He drove up and asked the name of the residents, and found it was the place he was looking for. He asked the lady where her husband was. She said he was away working for one of the neighbors, but she would send one of the children for him, which she did. When the man came, the visitor told him that he was the person who held the mortgage on his land, and said, "I should like to know when you can pay me the interest." The settler said, "I think if we have two or three good crop years I can pay up the back interest." The gentleman from New Hampshire then asked if this was all the property the man had, who replied "Yes: asked if this was all the property the man had, who replied, "Yes; this is all I have. I have just this quarter section of land, these three cows, a few chickens, a pair of horses, and some farm machinery which I have not paid for yet." The New Hampshire man then asked the settler if he could stay there and work it out. "Yes," was the reply, "I think I will stay and try to do it." The gentleman from New Hampshire then took the papers out of his pocket, turned them over to the settler, and said, "If you can stay here and support your family, you will have no occasion to pay the mortgage."

Mr. President, you can go into the State of South Dakota and into the western portion of Nebraska and into Kansas and buy these lands for less than the Indian price. Take the best lands in my State which are open to settlement—the Sisseton and Wahpeton On these reservations we opened for settlement about 550,000 acres. About one-half has been taken by actual settlers, who have been trying to make homes and make a living. They began in 1891. Five years have expired. We have extended the time for them to make payment for the lands, but they are unable to pay. The price is $2.50 an acre. Each settler must produce $400. He can not borrow the money at any bank in the State duce $400. He can not borrow the money at any bank in the State and he can not borrow $100 a quarter section from anybody in New England. This bill must pass or those people will leave that reservation and give up the struggle, and I think they would be wise to do it, for they can go 50 or 100 miles and purchase lands for a dollar or a dollar and a quarter an acre from the people of the East who have been obliged to take up the lands by mortgage foreclosure from homesteaders who had previously made the effort to pay for them and had failed.

I have received a telegram to-day from people on this reservation, which reads:

People on reservation all deeply in debt. Crop failure three years out of four. Banks will not loan enough to prove up. Not one in ten can save land. Statement mailed delayed by storm.

So I have not received it. The simple question now is, whether we shall drive those people from their lands or whether we shall give them an opportunity to remain there. There is no chance for a revenue to be derived from it.

Before I allude to the map, to which I desire to call the atten-tion of the Senate, I wish to make some reference to the minority report.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator to explain more fully who it is that says that four millions and a half of revenue can be derived from this land, and whether it can be derived annually, and in what manner?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I suppose the Senator refers to the Sioux Reservation, which is opened to settlement, and lies partly in North and South Dakota and Nebraska.

The diagram furnished in the minority report of the committee comes from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and with it he says:

Loss to the United States, if settlers are relieved from payment, $4,624,000.

Mr. ALLEN. How?
Mr. PETTIGREW. Of course that is based upon the idea that that land will all be taken up by homesteaders, that they will live there five years, and then pay the money for it, which, of course, is absolutely impossible and never can occur. After seven years but 700,000 acres of these lands have been taken, and those are lands along the streams where there is water, the best of all of them. The rest of the land can not be occupied by homestead settlers, for they will not produce crops which will support a family. Mr. PLATT.

Mr. PLATT. May I ask the Senator a question? Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly. Mr. PLATT. There were a little over 9,000,000 acres of the Great Sioux Reservation, said to be eight million and a half, opened to settlement or entry. I suppose it will be admitted that the Government will have to pay 50 cents an acre for those lands, somehow.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Anyhow; and it has to do it right away.
Mr. PLATT. That is $4,000,000, is it not?
Mr. PETTIGREW. There are 8,550,000 acres.

Mr. PLATT. Four million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is true. The Government made an agreement with these Indians by which it promised ten years The Government made an after the treaty was ratified to pay 50 cents an acre for the land not taken by settlers, and as it is nearly all vacant and untaken, the Government will have to pay the Indians for it, as the ten years have nearly expired.

I wish to call attention to another fact. This land was bought

Indians who received it in compensation for the lands which they yielded in Minnesota, Iowa, and Nebraska, and it is part of the purchase price of the lands in those States which have been given to homesteaders.

Mr. PLATT. I merely referred to that point to answer the question of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Allen] as to how the Government could lose that amount of revenue. It will have to pay for it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Government has to pay for it any way. It makes no difference whether or not the settlers pay for it. I will read to the Senator, if he desires, the provision of the law in regard to that subject.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from South Dakota permit me? Mr. PETTIGREW. Certainly.
Mr. ALLEN. I wish to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question. If the Government takes back the lands—and it will be compelled to take them back; that is all there is to it—from what source is it likely to derive any revenue after they are taken back? What are you going to do then?

Mr. PLATT. The Senator from South Dakota says the Government can not get any revenue; that it can not sell or dispose of

Mr. ALLEN. I, too, say you can not get any revenue. I say those lands are not only semiarid, but arid. Ordinarily they are not worth 15 cents a quarter section outside of their use for graz-

Then it will not help anybody to pass the bill except a few settlers already on the land?

Mr. ALLEN. Except a few people who are on this land, trying to make a living, and who are making a precarious sort of living.

If they are not relieved, you will throw them on the balance of the nation to be supported in some form.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is it exactly.

Mr. ALLEN. And they would be self-supporting in their way if they were permitted to go on and make a pioneer struggle.

Mr. STEWART. Are these lands similar to those in western Kansas?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes.
Mr. STEWART. I had occasion in connection with a committee to make an investigation there some years ago with a view to irrigation. I ascertained that there had been three sets of settlers. When there was a good year, when there was rain, a large number of settlers would go out. Then there would be drought for five or six years, and the settlers would have to be taken away, and they were taken away by contributions of benevolent people, and large tracts of land were abandoned. Then, again, there would be a rainy season or two, and the railroads would represent that a rainy season or two, and the railroads would represent that there was a chance for settlement there, and another set of settlers would go upon the land. They would have to leave in the same way. There were three attempts in the course of the preceding years to settle a vast region of land—and I presume people will continue to make such attempts—but they were not able to support their families and stay there. Some of them even starved to death. The distress was very great among those who attempted to make homes there.

Now, if these are similar lands, and anybody is trying to live upon them, it seems to me the United States had better let the settlers stay there, because there is no possibility of their paying anything to the Government. The Government will get nothing in any event if they are similar lands, and I understand they are, to the lands in western Kanses where I seem to stay and it was a property of the lands. to the lands in western Kansas, where I spent several weeks investigating the irrigation question, for I am satisfied those lands will never be worth a cent.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President—
Mr. PETTIGREW. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs yields to me. I will ask him to state whether it is not a fact that the Indians from whom these various lands have been from time to time purchased by the Government are under the control of and dependent on the Federal Government for support, and if those titles were extinguished by and through the purchase, would not the Government, without the intervention of any transaction, be compelled to appropriate money directly from the Treasury for the support of those people?

Mr. PETTIGREW. There is no question that that is a correct statement. Further than that, the Government has already paid statement. Further than that, the Government has already paid for nearly all these reservations. In the case of the Sioux Reservation a payment is yet to be made. It is not a very large payment. Three million dollars has already been deposited in the Treasury, and at the end of ten years after the ratification of the treaty, which will occur in 1899, the Government will be obliged, whether or not it disposes of any of the lands, to pay the remainder of the money to those people; to put it in the Treasury, where it will bear interest for all time for their benefit.

I wish to state, in reference to the remarks of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. Stewart], that I have here a table of the western counties of Kansas—there are twelve or thirteen counties—showing the population in 1887 and the population in 1893. The population of those counties has fallen off 60,000 during that time. That numof those counties has fallen off 60,000 during that time. That number of people have moved away. The remainder can stay there and make homes in that country—inasmuch as they can graze cattle on the lands that the other people abandoned, because they were mortgaged, because they could not pay the interest, much less support their families.

Mr. FRYE. What percentage is that?

Mr. PETTIGREW. It is 60,000 out of 101,000.

Mr. PLATT. Sixty thousand people have gone?

Mr. PETTIGREW. They have gone. There were 101,000, leaving 41,000 people in that country. They can remain; but when we undertook to settle that country and put a man on each quar-ter section it was impossible for them to stay there. Those who ter section it was impossible for them to stay there. Those who are left in western Kansas irrigate small tracts of land, the same as people do in my State, and graze cattle on the surrounding unoccupied country.

If we wish to get revenue out of the sale of Indian reservations, we shall have to change our policy. We shall have to appraise the lands and sell them for what they will bring. The area of the public domain fit for homestead entry has already disappeared. We provide for the entry of lands under the desert-land act in the arid regions of the country where there is water, and we do not pretend to say that it is possible to occupy the land under the homestead law. So it is with nearly all the lands embraced within the provisions of the proposed law.

I wish to call attention to some portions of the minority report. The burden of the report is that the Government can not afford it; that it can not spare the money; that it must wring it out of these poor people if we can get it. Perhaps, Mr. President, that would be very well if we could get it, but Shylock was unable to collect his claim, and we shall be equally unable to collect this one. In the first place, the report goes on to say that there are other treaties with other tribes for ratification, and it rather intimates that if the pending bill passes, then the other bills will not be considered favorably; that these Indian reservations will con-tinue as such, I suppose, forever. I propose to look into that branch of the case for a moment.

The Senator says we are negotiating, and so we are to-day, with several Indian tribes for the cession of their small reservations. The area of the reservations for which we are negotiating embraces so small a portion of the public domain that I will not enter into that question in particular, but I will state that, as far as I am concerned, when those treaties come in for ratification, I shall be decidedly in favor of changing the policy of the Government in regard to disposing of lands thus acquired. I think the water should be saved; I think the timber lands should be reserved from sale for ever. I think the timber should be sold, only the ripe trees being cut; that agents of the Government should be put in charge to see that when the trees are cut down new trees are planted in their places and the forests protected and preserved from sale; that the sources of the water should be taken charge of, and the lands that sources of the water should be taken charge of, and the lands that can be reached by water disposed of under some provision by which it will be possible to inhabit that country.

The minority also say there are bills pending before the committee which will be affected by this legislation, and the first one named is an agreement with the Turtle Mountain band of the Chippewa Indians in the State of North Dakota. If that agreement is ratified, and it ought to be ratified by Congress, it will not be affected by this legislation, for that treaty does not provide that the lands shall be sold and the proceeds applied to the support of the Indians. It simply provides for extinguishing the Indian title to those lands in North Dakota, many of which have already been disposed of under the homestead law and other land laws of the United States. Those lands were opened up to settlement without making an agreement with those people. Now, the agreement which is made proposes to pay them about 10 cents an acre without making an agreement with those people. Now, the agreement which is made proposes to pay them about 10 cents an acre and extinguish their title, and it ought to be done. But there is no provision for selling the lands under the homestead law or otherwise, and very many of them have already passed out of the control of the United States.

The next agreement which the minority say is here for ratifica-tion is one for the Shoshone or Wind River Reservation in Wyoming. This, again, is the purchase of a very large spring, supposed to have medical properties. A small tract of land is to remain as a public park if the treaty is ratified, and the land is not to be opened to settlement or disposed of at all.

The next agreement is one with the Kiowas, Comanches, and Apaches of Oklahoma Territory. I understand it relates to a tract of land which has already been purchased from other Indians, and now these Indians come in and claim they have some right to it.

some right to it.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, no; it is a very large tract of land now in possession of the Indians and largely rented to cattlemen.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator from Connecticut says I am mistaken about it. If that is the case, then the question as to how we shall dispose of those lands will come up when the treaty is ratified. It has no bearing upon this question whatever.

The Pend d'Oreille or Calispel Reservation in Washington contains about a township of land, and is hardly worth considering; and tains about a township of land, and is hardly worth considering; and tains about a township of land, and is hardly worth considering; and those are the only ones which are pending before the committee. Now, Mr. President, we have pursued the policy of disposing of these lands under the homestead law from 1862 up to 1889. The minority say that policy was changed in 1880, when we purchased certain land of the Ute Indians in Colorado. That is not the fact. That provision did not change the policy, for under that treaty the lands were not to be opened for settlement under the homestead law or to be disposed of under the public land laws of the United law or to be disposed of under the public-land laws of the United States, but a special provision was inserted for the sale of those lands and the appropriation of the proceeds for the benefit of the Indians. As those lands were largely arid lands, mineral lands, it was a wise provision, and ought to be considered in the future. practically repealed the homestead law, and that reservations since purchased have been opened only under a provision requiring the settler to pay for his homestead after he had already paid for it by conquering the wilderness. The minority intimate that since 1880 we have changed the policy,

Let us see. In 1888 the Government purchased from the Blackfeet Indians in Montana 17,570,000 acres of land, and paid $4,300,000 for it without any provision whatever for reimbursement; and the Government paid four times what it was worth at that. It is grazed over to-day and undisposed of, and it will continue to be grazed over and will never be disposed of under the homestead law. Although it is open to settlement under the homestead law, nobody will occupy it, and there is no provision requiring payment.

We purchased, March 20, 1889, 2,000,000 acres of land of the Seminole Indians in Oklahoma, and it cost$2,000,000. We opened that land to homestead settlement without any provision in regard to repayment when the settler lived for five years upon the land. In 1882 we purchased 1,553,000 acres of the Crow tribe in Montana, at a cost of about $1,000,000. These purchases between 1882 and 1889 aggregate 21,000,000 acres, costing the Government $7,300,000. Most of the land was purchased in 1888 and 1889, and we threw it open to settlement under the homestead law, without any provision as to payment

Mr. President, aside from the lands in Montana, the lands in Mr. President, aside from the lands in Montana, the lands in North Dakota and South Dakota, the lands in Minnesota, the remainder of the lands affected by the provisions of the proposed law are located in the western part of Oklahoma, and almost the same conditions apply to those lands, at least they apply to most of them, that apply to lands on the Great Sioux Reservation in South Dakota.

These lands were purchased from the Indians and opened to settlement, requiring the settler, after residing five years, to pay $2.50 an acre for those lands east of the ninety-seventh meridian, and $1.50 an acre for the lands west of that meridian. Two-thirds of those lands are grazing lands. It is true there was wild excitement; lands are grazing lands. It is true there was wild excitement; that thousands of people rushed into that country. They supposed that because it was an Indian reservation it must be more valuable. The very proceedings in both Houses of Congress tended to excite among the homeless people of this country the feeling that perhaps there was a region where they could thrive and prosper. Our own acts, providing that the Army should be used to prevent people from entering that country until a certain day, when a proclamation should be issued; the talk in the Senate; the talk in committees, in order to boom the price and get as much as they could on the part of the exceedingly shrewd Cherokee Indians; the statement often made that they could sell the land for $5 an acre statement often made that they could sell the land for $5 an acre and that a syndicate was ready to take it, in order to get a good bargain out of Congress, excited people in this country, and they did rush in.

How did they rush in? If you had required that they should pay for the land in advance—and the same remark will apply to How did they rush in? If you had required that they should pay for the land in advance—and the same remark will apply to the reservations in my State—these homeless people could not have made the payment, and therefore they would not have gone. But if the land were fertile, they hoped at the end of five years to produce enough to make the payment. So we trapped them, as it were, into the purchase, by giving them five years of time in which to raise the money. They have gone upon the land. They have taken their families. They have taken what they had. They have mortgaged their personal property, everything that is movable, in order to sustain life. They have just begun to learn how to make a living on those semiarid lands; to learn to store such of the water as they can store to irrigate their gardens; to learn to raise and graze stock, and eke out an existence. In the past two years they have come to Congress and asked for an extension of the time in which they should make this payment, and we have granted it; and yet conditions do not improve.

It will be absolutely impossible for the people upon those lands for years to come, until they have accumulated capital, to earn more than a living, or to make any payment whatever to the Government. I believe that for those people it is the better and wiser more than a living, or to make any payment whatever to the Government. I believe that for those people it is the better and wiser policy on the part of the Government of the United States to give them their homes than it is to drive them from them, and that is all that can be accomplished if the pending bill shall be defeated.

Mr. ALLEN. How many acres have been taken?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not know. The statement of the Land Department does not show just the number of acres which have been taken. In Oklahoma the area is large, covering quite a large portion of the reservations purchased, but in my State the area is not large. On one reservation it is about 250,000 acres; on another, 700,000 acres, and on another, the Yankton Reservation, which was opened recently, about 80,000 acres. The remainder in my State, which covers an area of between mine and nine and a half million acres, is still unoccupied.

One million acres out of about 9,000,000 acres? Mr. PETTIGREW. One million out of 10,000,000 acres, although those reservations have been open to settlement for the last six or seven years.

I have had prepared a map, which I hope Senators will observe.

It shows the original area of the United States, the purchase from Spain, the purchase from France, the annexation of Texas, and the two purchases from Mexico. Any Senator can readily see that in two purchases from Mexico. Any Senator can readily see that in those purchases from foreign governments most of the lands disposed of under the homestead law are included—the great States of the West, Florida, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and the two Dakotas, and so on west to the Pacific Ocean. In addition to the purchases from foreign nations, we have purchased from Indian tribes in this country very much most than is shown on this mean.

I have had drawn upon the map a line showing the average annual rainfall. The east line on the map shows that the average rainfall is 30 inches along that line. The next line shows that the average rainfall is 20 inches. The average rainfall then decreases from the first line to the second line. From the second line to the third line the rainfall decreases from 20 inches to 15 inches per annum.

Now, between those two lines lies nearly every acre of land affected by the proposed legislation, and everyone who has investigated the subject at all knows that an average rainfall of less than 25 to 30 inches is insufficient to mature crops.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the rainfall in the great space?

Mr. PETTIGREW. In the great space between the two lines, marked 15, is the arid region of the United States, and the rainfall there is from none at all to 15 inches. Vast areas of that country have from 5 to 10 inches of rainfall. There are some mountain peaks and groves of timber at high altitudes where the rainfall is greater. That country is almost entirely undisposed of. The only greater. That country is almost entirely undisposed of. The only large reservation outside of this area where the rainfall is from 15 to 30 inches, and where it is insufficient to mature crops, is the Crow Reservation in Montana, which is in a region where the rainfall is less than 10 inches.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to direct his attention to the fact that the rainfall, even where it amounts to 18 or 20 inches, does not come at the season of the year that would mature crops? It comes early in the spring, leaving the crops half grown, and they are withered up by the sun and the atmosphere afterwards.

Mr. PETTIGREW. That is undoubtedly true, and from that fact arises another, that it does mature a scanty growth of very excellent grass. Those lands are excellent for grazing, although it takes several acres to maintain one animal. Therefore they are not adapted, except in very small areas, to homestead settle-

The Fort Berthold Reservation in North Dakota was opened to of it yet. The report of the minority of the committee shows that not an acre of that land has been disposed of. The report also shows that although those reservations have been opened to settlement from 1889 up to the present time, the total receipts of the Government from all of them have been $\frac{146}{2},000$, and most of that was accommentation from the set of town sites in Obleshows and from sum has come from the sale of town sites in Oklahoma and from settlers who have commuted lands where there were, perhaps, valuable water rights. Wherever there is a valuable water right the homesteader would go in and prove up and sell it to cattlemen, who use it to water the cattle that graze upon the adjoining

This is not the proper method to pursue if we wish to gain revenue from the disposal of those lands. If the pending bill is not passed, and we undertake to dispose of those lands under the provisions of existing law, the revenue from homesteaders, in my opinion, will not exceed two and a half million dollars, and even that sum will not be realized for several years. The revenue from other sources, from the disposal of the lands for town sites, from the disposal of mineral lands—for these smaller reservations in the western portion are mostly mineral, and therefore not subject to homestead entry—will not exceed five or six million dollars more. In other words, we must change the policy if it is the desire of the Government to obtain revenue. In the meantime, it seems to me the only wise thing we can do is to relieve these people who are struggling to maintain a foothold in this country. Let us give them the land they now occupy and allow them to go on and try to maintain homes. If it is thought desirable that another method of disposing of the remainder of the land shall be adopted, I shall be glad to assist in its adoption.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President, I desire to add to my remarks extracts upon this subject from the platforms of the political parties of last year. The Republican platform adopted at St. Louis, under the head of "Homesteads," contains this paragraph:

We believe in an immediate return to the free-homestead policy of the Republican party, and urge the passage by Congress of a satisfactory free-homestead measure, such as has already passed the House and is now pending in the Senate.

ing in the Senate.

Mr. FRYE. What measure is that? This bill of yours?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Yes, sir; this bill of mine.

Mr. PLATT. About a third of it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Which platform does the Senator from South Dakota admire the most?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I admire the Democratic platform far the most. Mr. CULLOM.

Let us hear it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. But I should judge that my New England friends do not care to stand on any platform.

The Democratic platform, adopted at Chicago, reads as follows:

The Democratic party believes in home rule and that all public lands of the United States should be appropriated to the establishment of free homes for American citizens.

The People's Party platform says:

We demand that bons fide settlers on all public lands be granted free homes, as provided in the national homestead law, and that no exception be made in the case of Indian reservations when opened for settlement, and that all lands not now patented come under this demand.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, from the fact that a number of citizens of the State I have the honor in part to represent are seriously interested in this bill, I ask the indulgence of the Senate a moment, to the end that I may make an explanation of the bill as we understand it.

The bill does not propose to exempt from the payment of any legal dues persons entering lands under the laws of the United States relating to mineral lands, town sites, commutation of States relating to mineral lands, town sites, commutation of homestead entries, or, indeed, under any law under which prior to 1889 the payment of money was exacted.

Between the time the Government was established under the Constitution and the year 1889 the United States had paid out in the extinguishment of Indian title to lands west of the Alleghany Mountains about $400,000,000 in money. These disbursements were made in divers and sundry ways, in some instances because of direct negotiations with the Indians for the surrender of title; in other instances by and through the distribution of annuities for the support of the Indians found in indigent circumstances here and there on the various reservations. and there on the various reservations.

up to 1862 the policy prevailed of selling the land thus acquired from the Indians at public auction. This policy led to the most flagrant scandals ever perpetrated relative to the disposition of the public domain in this country. It led to the aggregation in the hands of speculators and individuals bent upon profit making rather than the development of the country of large areas of rather than the development of the country of large areas of land purchased at public auction.

For the purpose of avoiding this abuse and giving a healthy growth to States and communities that were in embryo at that time, the homestead law was passed. One of the conditions of this law which could in no instance be waived was that the individual claiming its benefits should settle upon and continue to cultivate and improve the 160 acres of homestead land for at least five years. That statute constituted the basis of the upbuilding of the States of Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, the Dakotas, California—indeed, the mighty empire that now exists west of the great Mississippi River, and much of the country east of that river as well. In 1865, I remember, the State of Illinois was a very sparsely settled country. I happened to move there in that year, as a boy, and I remember that the people were then suffering from the land speculations that had obtained at the time cash entries were in force by the Government, and public sales occurred. Under the homestead law the great State of Illinois became an imperial Commonwealth in an incredibly short period of time. The same is true of Indiana and Missouri and the various States to which it applied.

During all this period of time land was sold under the pre-emption law, under the town-site law, under the mineral laws, for cash; but in no instance prior to 1889, regardless of the manner in which the Government acquired the title to the land, did the public policy of the United States as shown by our laws justify the collection of one dollar from the homestead settler who had resided upon his land for five years, except small office fees. This homestead settler blazed the trail, built the first schoolhouse, built the country church, helped to establish government, law, and order in the wilderness and on the broad and inhospitable plains. The Government gave to him his title to a quarter section of land, after the lapse of five years, as free as the summer air. He had earned it honestly, and it was wise policy to reward him with the well-earned title.

In the year 1889 numerous Indian reservations were opened to settlement in the western and southwestern portions of the United States. Those reservations were purchased from the Indian tribes, and for the first time in the history of the Government an amendment was interjected requiring that the prospective homestead settler should reimburse the United States for the money paid out for the title.

Let it be borne in mind that these titles were acquired from the wards of the Government, the Indian dependents on the reservations. The United States rests under a moral obligation to feed, clothe, and, to the extent of its ability, educate these wards. It can not in the face of the civilized world renounce this duty, nor can it avoid its performance. Instead of appropriating money direct without any semblance of consideration received in return, for over one hundred years the Government has adhered to the policy that the constant diminution of the Indian reservation is desirable, and that it is better for the Indian to feel that he is paying something to the Government for the food he receives rather than to feel at all times that he is a pauper, dependent upon the good will and generosity of the great father, the Government of the great father of the great father. ment of the country.

These Indians must be fed and clothed whether we ever get another acre of land from them or not. If these lands had not been purchased in 1889 and prior years, and the consideration agreed upon, we would have regularly appropriated money from the public Treasury to feed, clothe, and maintain these wards of the public Treasury to feed, clothe, and maintain these wards of the nation independent of, and without regard to, the fiction of making a purchase of land from them.

The purchase merely made them feel they were not paupers.

Mr. PLATT. Why, Mr. President, we would not have had to feed the Five Tribes, from whom we bought all of the land which the bill as it passed the other House contemplated, I think.

Mr. CARTER. The Five Tribes, as I understand it, have been for an indefinite period of time, since their transportation from points east of the Mississippi River, dependent upon the Government of the United States in one form and another. It is true they have leased their lands from time to time to speculators. The speculators have grazed stock upon the lands, and out of the The speculators have grazed stock upon the lands, and out of the revenue thus derived they have lived; but primarily the Government made provision for their maintenance, and has always been obligated to protect and look after them as a dependent race of yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Mr. President — The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the lands occupied by the Five Civilized Tribes were purchased from France; that the Five Civilized Tribes lived east of the Mississippi River, and that these lands were given to them as the purchase price of other lands which we acquired of them as the purchase price of other lands which we acquired of them and opened to homestead settlement.

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. The reason why I interrupted (perhaps I ought not to have done so) was because the statement was made that if we had not purchased these lands of the Indians we would have had to support them. These Oklahoma lands were purchased of the Five Civilized Tribes, although they were not occupying them. The lands to which the bill as it passed the House refers are the lands which were purchased from the Five Civilized Tribes. We were not supporting them; we should not have supported them; we should not have paid them anything for subsistence, or any were not supporting them; we should not have supported them; we should not have paid them anything for subsistence, or anything of the sort if we had not bought the lands, so far as the Oklahoma lands are concerned.

Mr. CARTER. There is manifestly a misunderstanding on the part of the Senator. The Five Civilized Tribes, so called, occupy what is known as the Indian Territory. They have a government of their own, and the highest development of tribal relationship, I believe, existing outside of the State of New York among the Seneca Indians. The Indians from whom we purchased the Territory known as Oklahoma are, I insist, measurably dependent Seneca Indians. The Indians from whom we purchased the Territory known as Oklahoma are, I insist, measurably dependent upon the proceeds of the lands sold for a livelihood.

Mr. PLATT. We purchased the Territory of Oklahoma from the Cherokees—the Cherokee Outlet was a large portion of it—and from the Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Seminoles, principally. There was some purchased from the Sac and Fox, and some from minor tribes, but the great bulk of it was purchased from those I have named.

from those I have named.

Mr. CARTER. A complication arose relative to the title of that country. The Cheyennes, Arapahoes, and other Indians claimed supremacy over the land opened. A portion of the Five Civilized Tribes, on the other hand, asserted some sort of title. A compromise was made and some payment made to each. The details of that matter need not be gone into. The fact is that the Indians, the Indians of the Northwest, all of the Indian tribes of this country outside of the State of New York and the Indian Territory proper, have been dependent upon the Government of the United States. The appropriation bills passed here from time to time will demonstrate that fact.

Mr. TELLER. They draw $8,000,000 a year.

They draw $8,000,000 a year.

These Indians draw in one shape and another Mr. CARTER. from the Treasury, either chargeable to their own funds or directly drawn from the public funds, about $8,000,000 per year for their general support in fuel, food, clothing, and farming implements.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Montana will allow me, they draw between seven and eight million dollars, independent of their own funds, directly from the Government of the United

Mr. FRYE. The Maine tribes take care of themselves. There are two tribes in Maine.

Mr. TELLER. The trouble with the Maine tribes is that you killed most of them off so early that the Government did not have much of a burden.

Mr. CARTER. They were not egetting into the Treasury just then.

They were not educated up to the matter of getting into the Treasury just then.

Now, the question arises, Shall we at this time, when all of the land between the two oceans belonging to the public domain upon which the rainfall is adequate to raise a crop has been taken up and appropriated, when the only remaining land subject to homestead on the continent rests in the arid or semiarid region, insist upon a change of a policy which has obtained since 1862 with reference to the administration of the homestead law? We insist that since the Government extinguished the Indian title to Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, the Dakotas, Kansas, Nebraska, and other States South and West, and let the homestead law operate freely there without price, it is hardly just to those who remain now on the fringes of the mountains in the arid belt to suffer under onerous burdens not heretofore imposed.

The insistence by the Government upon the extortion of this fee will result in what? In compelling the unfortunate who desires ultimately to acquire title to give a mortgage to the country banker or money lender. I will guarantee to day there is not one in fifty of the homesteaders in Oklahoma who has a particle of personal property which is not subject to a chattel mortgage paying from 1 to 3 per cent a month interest. That is true of these homestead-I to 3 per cent a month interest. That is true of these homesteaders as a rule. They go into a new country without means, without financial connections, with the burden of a large family to start with, with a hard line of difficulties to meet and overcome, with no means of reaching the market except as the railroads are built in and new avenues of trade are opened up. It is a hard lot, indeed, on the whole. The Delegate from the Territory of Oklahoma tells me that there are quite 40,000 people living in frail cabins, clay dugouts, or sod houses in that Territory to-day. I will guarantee that of the 40,000 there are not a dozen without a chattel mortgage bearing ruinously and usuriously high rates of interest. For the Government to extort now in addition from those people from 50 cents to a dollar an acre for the land upon which they live is to drive them to the hands of the usurer and which they live is to drive them to the hands of the usurer and compel them to give a mortgage to the money lender in the local market and ultimately to transfer the title the homesteader may acquire to the individual who advances the money to pay the Government.

To insist on these payments from the overburdened frontiers-man seems to me like extortion of money from the worthy and struggling poor.

Such a course will result in the aggregation in single owner-ship of large areas of land to be used for grazing purposes. It can have no other result. That is contrary to the policy of the Government as often expressed and as made manifest in all other Government as often expressed and as made manness in the existing laws.

But it is said that this measure is equivalent to buying a piece of land and giving it to the homesteader; that the individual who lives upon the land ought to pay for it. It happens to be true that this Government in its wisdom has determined that the building up of solid, virtuous, self-sustaining communities constitutes a prime purpose in our civilization and governmental policy. We have not heretofore sought to make profit out of the settlers upon the frontier. We have sought to make patriots out of them. We have sought to add to their wealth rather than to subtract from it. They, in turn, have come forward in times of need, baring their breasts to the steel of the enemy to protect the Union ing their breasts to the steel of the enemy to protect the Union and the flag regardless of the point at which it was assailed.

They are ready to do it to-day. They cheerfully pay their share of the general burdens for the support of the Government in of the general burdens for the support of the Government in whatsoever quarter the expenditures may be made. You never have heard, and you will not hear, coming from the Dakotas, or Montana, or Oklahoma, or Colorado any complaint whatever about the $20,000,000 per year that is spent on the rivers and harbors of this country. Yet none of them have any rivers or harbors of consequence. You will not hear one solitary murmur from that region about the twenty or thirty million dollars per annum spent in naval vessels to float over and police the seas. No suggestion is made from quarters out there to the effect that the people living along the rivers and adjacent to the harbors should pay those bills for their improvement, but they feel that such work is in bills for their improvement, but they feel that such work is in the interest of a common country.

All the homesteaders now living upon the ceded reservations desire is that an ancient policy should not be changed to their disadvantage in the presence of conditions the hardest the homesteaders have ever encountered since the homestead policy was inaugurated in this country.

The care for the Indians devolves upon the Government as a matter of course. The mere question here is, Shall the Government seek to shirk this responsibility, discourage further development upon the frontier, and fix the burden of maintaining the Indians upon the struggling homesteader, who can not, in the nature of things, discharge it?

Why, Mr. President, the manner in which this law has operated for the last eight years constitutes a sufficient condemnation of it. It is said that the Government is merely to recoup itself for expenditures made. We will take the case of the Crow Indians in the State of Montana. From the Crow Indians we acquired something like 900,000 acres of land. We paid the Indians for that land the sum of $946,000—that is, we agreed to pay it—and we are paying it out in the way of cattle; in the way of the construction of irrigating ditches on that reservation, in order to make those Indians self-sustaining; in the way of wagons distributed to them, and in various ways looking to their present well-being and self-support ultimately.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator mean that the Government reserves in the treaties the right to act to a certain extent as a trustee for those Indians?

Mr. CARTER. Unquestionably, to act as trustee for those Indians; and it provides that this money shall be expended under the direction of the Government itself. On the Crow Reservation an agent of the United States is in charge of the construction of irrigating ditches along the Little Big Horn River, near where the famous Custer battlefield is located. Those Indians are doing the work under the supervision of a Government agent, and to the Indians wages are being paid each and every day for the performance of the ditching or the canal digging.

The terms of the treaty most clearly elucidate the point presented by the Senator from Maine. It will be observed that not one dollar in money has been paid to the Indians under the treaty, the terms whereof merely provided for the maintenance and bet-terment of the condition of the tribe. The following are the terms relating to consideration and the manner of its payment:

relating to consideration and the manner of its payment:

That in consideration of the cession of territory herein made by us as individual Indians and heads of families of the Crow tribe to the Government of the United States, the said Government of the United States, in addition to the annutities and sums for provisions and clothing stipulated and provided for in existing treaties and laws, hereby agrees to pay the sum of $948,000, lawful money of the United States, in the manner hereinafter described:

First. That of the above-named sum there is hereby appropriated and set apart $200,000 to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the building of dams, canals, ditches, and laterals for the purposes of frigation in the valleys of the Big Horn and the Little Big Horn rivers and on Pryor Creek and such other streams as the Secretary of the Interior may deem proper: Provided, That not to exceed $50,000 shall be expended annually in performing this work: And provided further. That the superintendent in charge of said works shall in the employment of laborers be required to give preference to such Indians of the Crow tribe as are competent and willing to work at the average wages to common laborers for the same kind of work, and the labor so employed shall be paid in cash.

That the sum of $55,000 is hereby appropriated and set apart as an irrigating fund, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior for the maintenance and management of the system of irrigation provided for in this agreement.

Third. That the sum of $25,000 or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated and set apart, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the construction of three grist mills, to be located one on Pryor Creek, one on the Big Horn, and one on the Little Big Horn River, at such points as the Indian agent may deem convenient and practicable, and at such times as the needs of the Indians may require.

Fourth. That the sum of $50,000 i agreement.

Fifth. That the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the building of schoolhouses at such points on the reservation and at such times as the indians may require, and upon the recommendation of the Indian agent.

Sixth. That the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated and set aside as a fund to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in repairing and improving the houses of the Indians now erected on the reservation, and to make them, as far as possible, warm and comfortable dwellings.

Seventh. That the sum of $3.000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the construction and equipment of three blacksmith shops, to be located at such places upon the reservation and to be built at such times as the Indian agent may recommend, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Eighth. That the sum of $552,000 is hereby appropriated and set aside as an annuity fund, to be distributed as follows: Each Indian of the Crow tribe, male and female, shall receive an annual annuity of $12 in cash for the period of twenty years from the date of this agreement, said annuity to be paid semiannually, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Ninth. That the sum of $46,000 is hereby appropriated and set aside, to be expended by the Indian agent, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, in the purchase of cattle, from time to time, as may be deemed advisable; the cattle so purchased to form a herd to be held in common by the Crow tribe. All cattle sold from said herd shall be paid for in cash, and the net proceeds of such sale shall constitute a fund to be known as the Crow herd fund. When such fund shall exceed the sum of $15,000, it shall be the duty of the Indian agent, and he is hereby required, to apportion to each Indian entitled to the annual annuity provided for in section 8 the sum of $5, to be paid in cash under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Tenth. That when each object for which a specific appropriation has been made in this agreement shall have been fully carried out and completed, then the balance remaining of such appropriation shall constitute a fund to be expended for the benefit of the Crow tribe in such manner as the Secretary of the Interior may determine.

When the treaty was executed and entered in

When the treaty was executed and entered into with these Indians, they were absolutely a dependent tribe. Since then they have been enabled to largely support themselves. They are a have been enabled to largely support themselves. They are a thrifty and energetic tribe of Indians, who have recently engaged in farming operations, which are rendered possible by the irrigating ditches which have been constructed by virtue of this policy.

Mr. FRYE. Does the Senator mean that the statement just made by him applies to all of the lands now in question?

Mr. CARTER. I do not know that the exact conditions apply in every case, but the conditions apply substantially as I have suggested, except as to the Five Civilized Tribes, and as to them the land purchases constitute an indirect system of Government aid.

Mr. PLATT. Five hundred and fifty-two thousand dollars of that Crow money was set aside as an annuity fund, and interest is paid on it annually.

Mr. CARTER. A portion was set aside as an annuity fund and a certain sum was invested in stock cattle, and another portion of the fund was set aside to be expended, as the Senator will observe, in sums not exceeding $50,000 per year, in the construction of irrigating canals, and this course of construction has been in progress ever since. In order to analyze this matter, we were to pay out to our wards, people we were in conscience, equity, and good morals bound to support, the sum of $946,000, and Congress provided that the settlers should pay to the Government on account of the lands thus acquired the sum of $3,550,000. is the result? Into that country, 200 miles from a market of any kind, poor people have drifted, have built rude huts and small houses of one kind and another, are generally in debt, and are struggling heroically with hard conditions to build up homes. In the course of the seven or eight years that have passed since the treaty was made from that whole country we have only received $840. If the Government of the United States insists either on ejecting these settlers from their homes or exacting payment, they simply return that section of country back into sheep and cattle ranges and throw the settlers upon the surrounding communities as homeless wanderers. The Government can not collect money to keep the Indians from the people who have not got the money to pay, and what I say with reference to the ceded portion of the Crow Reservation will hold good in reference to a number if not all of the others

As the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Pettigrew] suggested, considerable money has been received from town-site ventures of the Government in Oklahoma and at other points on the ceded portions of the reservations. This bill will not interfere with that proceeding in the future. Considerable money has been received from the sale of mineral lands in the mining regions. That will continue to flow into the Treasure of the sale of the continue to flow into the Treasure of the sale of the continue to flow into the Treasure of the continue to flow into the continue to flow into the Treasury as it has in the past.

I assert that little or no money has been collected from homestead settlers who have settled upon these ceded lands, and of all the thirty-five millions of prospective money to be collected from these settlers we have received from town sites and mineral entries and commuted homesteads, in the period of about eight years, in the neighborhood of $400,000; and this has been received because of the taking of the town sites, because of the payment for mineral claims, and the selection of commuted homesteads on the best and most eligible sites on the vast tracts of land involved.

and most eligible sites on the vast tracts of land involved.

Mr. President, the timeto make a departure is inopportune, but the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt] suggests that these good people are estopped from now coming in any manner through any Senator, Representative, or other person, and seeking relief from the onero usburdens placed upon them by the original act.
Let me suggest, in reply to that, that no settler sought the imposition of this extraordinary burden upon the homesteader; it was an unexpected innovation. In the case of Oklahoma, men went down to the border expecting that they were upon the very verge of the Promised Land, a land literally flowing with milk and honey, according to the ancient description; that if they could but get within, they would be fortunate enough to get a fertile farm or a corner lot in one of the new town sites, and their fortunes would then be made forevermore. Where there was one acre of good land in the Territory of Oklahoma, at least three men went in to settle upon it. The result was that in the wild scramble murder, perjury, and crime in every form was committed by excited men vainly seeking exemption from the hard conditions from which they had fled, hoping to better their condition in the last alluring portion of the public domain. They did not stop to analyze laws or conditions.

alluring portion of the public domain. They did not stop to analyze laws or conditions.

These people estopped, perchance, as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, because they went there knowing that this money was to be paid! They went there because they did not have any other place to go, and they have remained there implicitly believing that the Congress of the country would take notice of their condition and do justice by them in the end. It remains of their condition and do justice by them in the end. It remains with Congress to determine here and now whether the country, which has of late been opened up in various sections of the West and Southwest, shall be returned to the dominion of the cattle king and the great sheep grower, or shall be left under the control of these homesteaders who are unable to pay the Indian purchase price which the original law proposed to exact, making an aggregate sum nearly equal to the national debt at the close of the Revolutionary war.

Mr. PLATT obtained the floor.

Mr. CULLOM. As the Senator from Connecticut has the floor, and as there is not a full attendance at present, I think that the Senate might as well adjourn. I move, therefore, that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FRYE. Will the Senator withdraw that motion for a

Mr. CULLOM. Yes, if the Senator from Connecticut does not object.

CONSIDERATION OF BILLS RELATING TO NAVIGATION.

The Committee on Commerce has on the Calendar four House bills of considerable importance—general legislation—all of which will undoubtedly go to conference, and I regard it as important that early action shall be had on them. I do not think they will lead to discussion, and I ask unanimous consent that at 4 o'clock to-morrow afternoon-which will be about the time the Senate seems inclined to adjourn—I may be allowed to have those bills considered

Mr. HILL. What bills are they?
Mr. FRYE. They are all bills relating to navigation.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HILL. I should like to know the character of the bills.
Mr. PLATT. Of course the agreement is not to displace the pending bill.
Mr. FRYE. Of course not.
Mr. HILL. I should like to hear the titles of the bills read before the order is made.

Mr. FRYE. One relates to seamen, another to navigation, another to yachts—the provisions of which have all been agreed upon by the yacht owners and everybody else—and the other relates to the tonnage tax. It will take about an hour to read them.

Mr. COCKRELL. Do I understand that all of the bills have been approved by the committee unanimously?

Mr. FRYE. Not unanimously, but approved by a large majority of the committee.

Mr. PETTIGREW.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I desire to know what is the request.
Mr. FRYE. My request is, on behalf of the Committee on Commerce, that at 4 o'clock to-morrow afternoon certain bills relating to navigation, etc., may be taken up for consideration, and that the pending bill, if then under consideration, may be informally laid aside, 4 o'clock being the hour at which the Senate would ordinarily adjourn.

Mr. VILAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine about the yacht bill. There has been a great deal of opposition to that bill, which the Senator has seen manifested in the form of letters and communications.

Mr. FRYE. It has all been settled. Mr. VILAS. Have all the difference

Mr. VILAS. Have all the differences been adjusted?
Mr. FRYE. They have all been adjusted. There were very heavy and costly yachts that were contracted for about a year ago, and it was the desire of the yachtsmen that this bill should not take effect until those yachts had been completed. The yachts have now all arrived.

Mr. VILAS. I had understood that there was a great deal of Mr. ALLEN. That is proper.

Mr. TELLER. Is that all there is to the bill?

Mr. FRYE. That is practically all there is to that bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Maine? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 7, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CONGRESSIONAL DEMANDS FOR DEPARTMENTAL INFORMATION.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. GROSVENOR. On the 20th day of May last, Mr. Speaker,
I introduced in this House a series of resolutions which were Government in relation to the administration of the provisions of a certain law upon the statute books, to wit, the law called the civil-service law. These resolutions were referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and were reported back on the 5th day of June following, when they were duly adopted by the House and were officially communicated to the several heads of the Departments of the Government.

The resolution in each instance was couched in respectful language, directing the head of the Department to furnish certain information to Congress.

From that day to this no response has been made or received from any one of the Departments of the Government on the subject referred to, and while I realize the fact that under the present system, called the civil-service administration, the Departments have been greatly curtailed or crippled by the detention in service of inefficient clerks, and by other necessary incidents of this Administration, I nevertheless believe that I am justified in raising the question as to whether the demand of Congress, clearly within the scope of the powers and duties of Congress, has been treated respectfully by the heads of the Departments.

Therefore I offer for immediate adoption the resolutions I send to the desk, aimed and directed to each of the Departments of the Government. I send the first one to the desk and ask to have it read. They are all alike, and I will follow this one with others in their proper sequence.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question that the gentleman has not submitted any question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair of course knows nothing of the contents of the resolution which has just been presented. It will be read, subject to the right of any member to raise the point that it is not a privileged resolution.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I am ready to meet the gentleman from Arkansas on the question of the privileged character of the reso-

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be first read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved. That the Secretary of State be, and is hereby, requested to inform the House of Representatives why the State Department has falled to furnish the information requested of said Department by a resolution of the House of Representatives, No. 380, passed by this House on the 5th day of June, 1896.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is all there is of it. It is merely a request for information, addressed to the head of the Department, for the purpose of ascertaining why the direction of the House, or, in other words, the demand of the House, has been ignored by that Department.

Mr. TERRY. I have always understood, Mr. Speaker, that the regular way to attain the object the gentleman has in view was to frame a resolution in the form which has heretofore been used, to wit, that the Secretary of State be requested to transmit such information to the House "if not incompatible with the public

Mr. GROSVENOR. But, Mr. Speaker, we have gotten a long way past that point. Will the gentleman hear what has already transpired?

transpired?
Mr. TERRY. Certainly.
Mr. GROSVENOR. The resolution was adopted by the House on the 5th day of last June, calling for this information, which has not been supplied.
Mr. TERRY. I understand that. But I would ask the gentleman, for information, if that resolution, so adopted, was not in the usual form, namely, that the Secretary of State be requested to transmit to the House the information, "if not incompatible with the public interests."
Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, in response to the gentleman, I will state, in the first place, that it is not so couched, nor is it proper that such resolution should be so drawn. The House has a right to demand this information.

that such resolution should be so drawn. The House has a right to demand this information.

Mr. TERRY (interrupting). My understanding has always been that the phraseology I have quoted was used.

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; if the gentleman will allow me. This is an inquiry for a state of facts. We have a right to have the facts before us, and we have the right to assume that the statement of facts can not be incompatible with the public interest.

We have a right to determine the question as to the manual of the We have a right to determine the question as to the manner of the administration of a law in the various Departments of the Government. The gentleman is confusing two sets of resolutions. The form in which the President is asked to communicate information to Congress is that which the gentleman suggests. But in no case does Congress allow a Department to determine for itself whether the information desired is incompatible with the public interest. The officers at the head of the Department are statutory officers, and they are required to answer the demands of Congress.

Mr. TERRY. Upon what point does the gentleman desire to receive information?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have already stated—
Mr. TERRY. In the confusion I did not catch it.
Mr. GROSVENOR. The resolution was with reference to the administration of the civil-service law in each of the particular Departments to which it was addressed.

Mr. TERRY. There was so much confusion that I did not catch it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And the present resolution is simply to ask why the demands of Congress, in the former resolution, have getting the information.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is the only question now. But I do not want, I will say to the gentleman—I do not want to allow a doubt to enter the mind of the Speaker that this is a question of

mr. HENDERSON. It is too late to raise the question of the form of the resolution. That was passed on when the resolution was passed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Very well. The Speaker suggested that the question whether this was a question of privilege may be still open, and I do not want to get in here by any silence or waiver. I read:

Questions of privilege shall be, first, those affecting the rights of the House collectively.

The House has the right to ask for information from these Departments, and when a Department refuses compliance for seven long months it means simply that the Departments of this Government, as well as the Executive, have begun to ignore the demands of Congress.

Indicate of Congress.

I ask for the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. HENDERSON. All of them?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the first reso-Intion.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the special committee to investigate the Soldiers' Home at Leavenworth, Kans., be, and are hereby, authorized to procure the printing of the testimony taken by said committee, together with such exhibits used in said investigation as said committee shall deem necessary.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 878) to reduce the cases in which the penalty of death may be inflicted in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 9593) for the relief of W. H. Wade, late captain and acting regimental quartermaster, Thirty-first Ohio Volunteers.

Mr. LOUD. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] demands the regular order.

Accordingly, under the order already adopted, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4566) to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

in the chair.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the gentleman from California, he proposes to use all his time himself.

Mr. LOUD. Yes, sir. I would like to have an understanding with the gentleman from New York, so that there will be no misunderstanding hereafter. It was understood between the gentleman and myself that the time this morning, regardless of what time was consumed yesterday, should be equally divided between the two sides. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. QUIGG. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the time was to be divided this morning?

Mr. LOUD. To be equally divided this morning, regardless of the time used yesterday.

Mr. QUIGG. That is satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be the order. There was no objection.

Mr. QUIGG. I should like to ask the gentleman from California if he is going to give out any more time on his side?

Mr. LOUD. I think not.

Mr. QUIGG. Because if the gentleman is, I would rather that such time as he proposes to give out to somebody should be occurred as the such time as he proposes to give out to somebody should be occurred as the such time as he proposes to give out any more time on his side?

such time as he proposes to give out to somebody should be occupied now.

Mr. LOUD. I will not have any trouble with the gentleman about that. If I desire to put a gentleman in for five minutes, and if that should not be satisfactory to him, I will not do so.

and if that should not be satisfactory to him, I will not do so.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN].

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I think ten minutes will be ample time for me to say all I wish to say upon this subject, for it was so exhaustively and fully treated by my friend from New York [Mr. Quigg] yesterday, and the propositions made on the other side were so conclusively answered, that I do not think it will be necessary for me to go into a detailed argument upon the bill.

The avowed purpose of this bill, and the only purpose it seems to me that it can have, is to reduce expenditures in the Post-Office Department; and the gentleman from California has given us some figures, which seem to be very extravagant, showing that he

Department; and the gentleman from California has given us some figures, which seem to be very extravagant, showing that he intends to make a large saving in the Department by its passage. As has been said by others, if I believed he could do that I should be, perhaps, willing to vote for his bill, although I know that its passage will be detrimental to some very large and important industries in this country. But, as was said by the gentleman from New York, his bill will not save to the Government the expense of one postagetar; it will not save to the Government. of one postmaster; it will not save the expense of one postal clerk; it will not save the expense of one mail route; and it is well enough for us to recollect that it will not save one dollar upon all the star routes in this country.

Upon the star routes the mails are carried for a specific sum, Upon the star routes the mails are carried for a specific sum, and it makes no difference to the Government of the United States whether they carry 1 pound or 3 pounds or 300 pounds. They do not take weight into consideration when they make their bids for carrying the mails. They are practically all subcontractors, under some big contractor, who has taken many of these routes. They do not take into consideration the amount which they carry. They rarely are loaded down. The question is, How long is the route, how much will it cost them for teams, how much will it cost them for expenses, how much can they get on their route for carrying passengers, how much for doing errands, and all that? So that upon all the star routes of this country this bill will not So that upon all the star routes of this country this bill will not save one dollar. On the contrary, I believe that the first-class mail matter, which pays the highest rate of postage, and the third-class and fourth-class mail matter will be so diminished by this bill that the Government will lose more in revenues than it will gain in the reduction of expenditures.

Now, I had occasion during the Forty-eighth Congress, because at that time I was trying to get a Government building in Augusta, Me., and succeeded in doing so, to look up the business of Mr. E. C. Allen, now dead, who was the pioneer in this great publishing business, and to learn what he was paying to the Government. I was astonished to find the fact that, incidentally to his business and the second alass mell retreated to the government. and the second-class mail matter which he was sending out, he paid to the Government $100,000 a year for stamps. Now, my friend may think that if he shall succeed in passing his bill and it shall become law, all these business houses will go on the same, and that he will simply increase the amount of the postage which they have to pay.

Mr. LOUD. Where is this business house?

The house has gone Mr. MILLIKEN. It was in Augusta, Me.

out of existence since Mr. Allen died.

Mr. LOUD. Does not the gentleman know that the receipts of Mr. LOUD. Does not the gentleman know that the receipts of the Augusta (Me.) post-office never yet amounted to $90,000 a year? How, then, could one man have paid $100,000 a year for stamps? Mr. MILLIKEN. Does not the gentleman know that Mr. Allen,

Mr. MILLIKEN. Does not the gentleman know that Mr. Allen, who had a business house in Augusta, Me., also had a branch house in Portland, Me., and was also doing business in Boston? I did not say that he paid $100,000 a year for stamps to the Augusta office. I said that Mr. Allen, incidentally to the business that he did there in second-class postage, paid $100,000 in one year to the Government for stamps. That came out during an investigation

Government for stamps. That came out during an investigation I made, and came out by the testimony of Mr. Allen, who was to be believed as much as you or I or anybody else.

Now, I say my friend will not get the increased postage, because, if he passes this bill, he is going to ruin all these publishing houses, except the very richest and strongest of them. If there ever was a bill introduced into this House to enable the big fish to swallow the little ones, this is the bill. There is a large publishing house in Augusta, in my State, conducted by Vickery & Hill, one of the most respectable concerns in this country, and I do not think they care much whether this bill passes or not, because, while its pascare much whether this bill passes or not, because, while its passage will cause them to pay more postage on their second-class matter, they know that it will at the same time destroy smaller concerns which are their competitors, and will thus give them an advantage which will probably be at least as valuable as that which they now enjoy through a low rate of postage on second-class

With reference to the revenue which the Government reaps incidental to this second-class mail matter, I have a letter from the Forbes Lithograph Company, of Boston, who say:

Boston, January 5, 1897.

We would respectfully submit the fact that we are in receipt of an order from the publishers of Comfort for a million form letters (a third of which we are to deliver this month). This is a repetition of orders of a similar nature that have gone before, which must necessarily swell the receipts of the post-office, as we understand from its publishers they are all mailed in envelopes as first-class matter, and are the direct results of the existence of the publication Comfort. If the proposed change in the postal regulations goes into effect it will cut out a large part of this revenue which accrues to the United States Government for the mailing of the above form letters.

I have also a letter from Pulsifer, Cook & Co., of Boston. They

In regard to the so-called Loud bill, permit us as business men of Boston to file an earnest protest. The passage of the bill we believe would be a serious business misfortune at a time when the country has had enough in that line. Clearly many members of Congress do not appreciate the immense interests involved. As an illustration, we have furnished for one paper alone—Comfort—several millions of envelopes in a single year, and are now doing work on a large order for its publisher. These envelopes are sent in the interest of that publication, and are used on letters which yield a revenue of from twenty thousand to thirty thousand dollars a year to the Government, and goes to the credit of first-class matter.

I have also a letter from Mr. Gannett, of Augusta, in my State, which throws much light on this subject. It is as follows:

AUGUSTA, ME., December 28, 1896.

Hon. S. L. Milliken,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Dear Sir: My interest as a publisher in the fate of the Loud bill and the fact that its author in a recent speech in Congress, using my publication, Comfort, as an illustration, most grossly misrepresented it, impels me to take the liberty to write you and correct some of Mr. Loud's erroneous statements.

ments.

It is simply amazing that a man, not to say a Congressman, who is the author and advocate of so important a bill should exhibit such dense ignorance regarding a subject which he has, or is supposed to have, studied for a rance regarding a subject which he has, or is supposed to have, studied for a year or more.

Mr. LOUD'S assertion that of Comfort's 1,250,000 circulation not 1,000 are sent to bons fide subscribers in this country, is more than three-quarters of a million out of the way. If we relied on a sample-copy circulation, as Mr. LOUD assumes, we should not print our paper in five different colors on a press made especially for Comfort at a cost of nearly $40,000, nor should we maintain an editorial department in the John Hancock Building in Boston, at an expense of $50,000 in a single year for editorial, original, copyrighted, literary, and art matter, nor should we go to the expense of sending an artist to Europe for special work for our paper. We take all this trouble and put out all this money to make Comfort valuable, instructive, and attractive to subscribers, and for the purpose of building up and maintaining our enormons subscription list. If we were satisfied with a mere sample-copy circulation, we might save all this expense by substituting paste pot and scissors for our large staff of editors, writers, artists, and specialists on various subjects.

for our large staff of editors, writers, artists, and specialists on various subjects.

Mr. Loud, further referring to Comfort's enormous circulation, read a letter from an unnamed advertising agent at South Bend, Ind., calling Comfort the king of frauds simply because, as he claims, four copies were received by him in one day. It is often a trick of advertisers to establish with printed stationery an advertising agency, and to send an order to the publisher, to save the commission. As this runs anywhere from 10 to 25 per cent, the temptation is great. There is no known advertising agency at South Bend, although one or two young men doing business there and advertising under a dozen different women's names pretended to run an advertising agency in order to get a commission such as is given to agents on their business, being their own advertisements. Comfort refused to print their advertisements (in fact, we have refused as much as $60,000 worth of undesirable advertising in one year), and the Post-Office Department, after an investigation, refused these parties the use of the mails. About four or five times a year we send one copy only to each name on a list of about 6,000 advertisers to keep in touch with their interests, and it is possible that one party, doing business under so many different names, might receive several copies of our paper through ignorance on our part of the deception. To maintain that any publisher, merely to obtain larger circulation, would send a number of papers to one person, except as a news agent, is an absurdity, as such a circulation would never pay an advertiser and the paper would lose its advertising patronage. Self-preservation, if nothing else, would prevent such action on the part of the publisher.

Mr. Loud also makes a statement to the effect that a man answers an advertisement, saying "send a postage stamp and you will learn something to your advantage," and that such advertisement being answered "you get a copy of this paper, you have become a subscriber until the resurrection morn, and that is the way they get their subscribers."

It would be interesting to know where Mr. Loud obtained such information. There is not and never has been such an advertisement put in any paper, either by Comfort or any other paper. There has never in the whole history of this paper been a subscriber placed on the subscription list who had not actually paid the subscription price.

Further on it is alleged that such a paper seeks admission to the second-class privileges of the mail with a nominal subscription list of 250 and at once circulates from one and a half million to two million copies. If Mr. Loud was at all familiar with the rules of the Department about which he talks, he would know that in making application for second-class privileges the publisher is obliged to make oath to certain facts which effectually would prevent such a thing, and that any infringement thereafter would throw the paper once being admitted to the second-class rates, the postal laws state explicitly that sample copies shall not be sent in excess of the number of actual subscribers, and further, that they shall not continually be sent to the same persons.

Does not Mr. Loud know that the Postal Department has hundreds of trained inspectors and detectives and that on suspicion that any paper is infringing the postal law one or more may be sent and make the m sending sample copies or advertising? It is an age of intense competition, and subscribers do not come flocking to any paper without being urged. The same push and activity are necessary to keep up a subscription list as are necessary to conduct any business or to win a seat in Congress, and much the same means are used.

Mr. Lour ignores the fact that the second-class matter, though handled at a loss to the Government, is directly productive of many times as much first, third, and fourth class business, on which he acknowledges the Government makes a profit. I will illustrate from my own experience:

While Comfort pays about $2,000 a month second-class postage, it often pays more than $3,000 for first-class or letter postage, and $2,000 more for third and fourth class postage, and has received $25,000 letters in a month, on which the postage amounted to $2,500. Here is $10,500 of first, third, and fourth class postage, and has received $25,000 letters in a month, on which the postage growing out of $2,000 a month of second-class business. This does not include the immense first, third, and fourth class business which is produced had the pay in the second clade the immense first, third, and fourth class business which is produced had to pay $5 a line of nits words such lessed and so wer they concept, replies by mail to make it pay. The thousands of dollars in postage that the Government gots as a direct result of a single issue of Comfort is beyond calculation. When I state that we have evidence proving that as many as $2,000 letters have been received from a single insertion of a two-line advertisement appearing in Comfort, and that from an advertisement costing $190, calling for a small sum of money, an advertiser in comfort received over 15,000 in cash, you can form some idea of the revenue derived by the Government in letter postage and money-order business from two or three hundred such advertisements appearing in the paper, to say nothing of the postage paid on merchandise that was sent in return to the c

I do not think that my friend from California [Mr. LOUD], who I of course know is sincere in believing that he is going to secure a great benefit to the Government by his bill, has taken fully into account the facts and considerations set forth in these letters.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOUD yielded five minutes to Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. MILLIKEN. I thank the gentleman from California. not know, Mr. Chairman, why the Post-Office Department in particular should be required to be self-sustaining. Of course it would be gratifying to us all if every Department of the Government could be self-sustaining, but the Departments were not created for that purpose. The Post-Office Department was not created for the purpose of bringing revenue to the Government. If it were the purpose to make money out of the business of that Department, then, carrying out the gentleman's ideas to their logical conclusion, we should have to abolish about three-fourths of the post-offices in this country, for I believe that more than three-fourths of them do not pay the expenses incident to their maintenance. The Post-Office Department was established for the purpose of accommodating the people of this country, giving them mail facilities—mail facilities not only for first-class matter, but for all kinds of mail matter they desire to receive. One of my friends on the other side, the gentle-man from Mississippi, I believe [Mr. KYLE], who urges the passage of this bill, said that he was in favor of the masses against the classes, and therefore wanted to give them 1-cent postage. Possibly my friend may have been on the stump during the late campaign and may have been in the habit of drawing a distinction between "the masses" and "the classes," and has not yet forgotten his stump speech. [Laughter.] As to 1-cent postage, let me ask the gentleman who it is that is chiefly interested in 1-cent postage. Is it the masses? Is it the working people, the laboring people of this country, the people who do not write, on an average, more than three or four letters during the year? What difference does it make to them whether they have 1 or 2 cent letter postage?

Ah, Mr. Chairman, if there is anybody in this country who is specially interested in having 1-cent postage, it is the great corporations, the great publishing companies among them. My friend Mr. Allen, of Augusta, in my State, whom I have already quoted, and who paid $100,000 in one year for postage, would have and who paid $100,000 in one year for postage, would have saved $50,000 that year if we had had 1-cent postage; but how much would the fellow save who works every day, and, as I have said, does n t write more than half a dozen letters a year? I am interested in 1-cent postage; my friend from California undoubtedly is; probably every member of this House is interested in having 1-cent postage; but the great masses of the people of this country have really very little interest in it, and if there ever was an absurd plea, it is the plea of the man who declaims for 1-cent postage and puts it on the ground that he wants it for the benefit of the masses. The masses of the people, Mr. Chairman, are interested in receiving, at as little cost as possible, this very literature which they do now receive under the existing law.

I wish I had time to describe that literature. My friend from California selected some of the worst books that go through the mails and derided them; but, sir, why does not he, and why do not those who agree with him, hold up to derision the newspapers of the country, which contain all kinds of matter, much of it such as ought not to go into any man's family? If my friend is going as ought not to go into any man's family? If my friend is going to plow up the wheat because there are a few tares in it, if he is going to exclude from the mails the whole of this fourth-class matter because, forsooth, there are some books circulated in that way that ought not to go through the mails, then I think he is going to work a very large restriction upon the liberty of the press in this country. There is nothing in this bill to prevent this phiceticable watter being carried in the mails. The Lond hill press in this country. There is nothing in this bill to prevent this objectionable matter being carried in the mails. The Loud bill places it on the same basis as the best literature in the country. It makes no discrimination. Let the committee of which Mr. Loud is chairman—the Committee on the Post-Office and Post--report a bill to exclude all bad literature from the mails, and I will vote for it. But the committee does nothing of the kind. It allows all the vicious literature that is now carried in the mails still to be carried in them, and still holds up these objectionable books as constituting a reason why this bill should pass. At the same time we hear nothing of the thousands of tons of first-class literature which, under the present law, is brought cheaply within the reach of the people.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania
[Mr. WANGER].

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, a time when there has been the great distress prevailing throughout the country which we have witnessed during the last three years seems to me the most inopportune of all times to enact a measure which, aiming to correct certain abuses, must nevertheless inevitably, according to the judgment of those best qualified to understand the subject, strike down a number of legitimate enterprises, among which are trade journals publishing information of the very highest value to the people of the country.

Now, the Postal Committee deserves the thanks of this body and the public for frankly acknowledging that it prefers private enter-prise in the carrying of the mails to the public discharge of that With private mail service we would have it simply in the thickly populated parts of the country, which are able to care for themselves. With private mail service there would not be an efficient and frequent service in the thinly populated and poorer sections. Yet it has been the conviction alike of the founders of this Government and of our statesmen ever since that there should be service all over the land irrespective of whether it is profitable or not, and that it is a legitimate function of the Government to serve every citizen with mail matter (alike letters and newspapers) without regard to what the cost of such carriage may be.

In referring to this matter the argument is based entirely upon the fact that there is a deficiency of revenues in the Post-Office Department. Well, if we count the vast quantity of Government matter which goes free, there is no deficiency at all; and when we come to consider the saving which it is alleged would be made by the passage of this bill we find that a computation based upon all second-class matter is necessary in order to reach anything the proportions which are mentioned by the champions of the sure as its fair result.

Now, we all can know by experience and observation that the great bulk of second-class matter is made up of legitimate and honorable newspapers of the country. If the proposition is to put every enterprise, every industry, every class of mail matter upon wn foundation, to do its own paying, then the remedy is to be had by an increase of the rate of carrying second-class matter—a proposition which nobody favors.

Now, as the advocacy of private enterprise in the carrying of the mails is in favor of the rich sections of the country as against the poorer sections, so the proposition to entirely exclude sample copies from the privileges of second-class matter is against the poorer and newer publications, which are not yet fully established, and is entirely in favor of those journals which have large sub-scription lists and which do not want rivals encouraged by enjoying the opportunity for sending out sample copies.

Postmaster-General Wanamaker, in all his allusions to this subject in the reports which he made, never went so far as is proposed by this committee. He always suggested that sample copies should be limited to a certain proportion of the regular subscribed edition of the journal; and that would meet the objections made that the privilege is abused by journals which are intended solely for adver-tising purposes. Why strike down legitimate trade journals which propose to confer and do confer great benefits upon the country by giving information and by fostering competition in the direction of these publications simply because there are some unscrupulous persons who abuse the opportunity which is presented? There can be no good reason for it. This committee does not propose to make up the deficiency. This committee says nothing about the tons of matter which are daily sent out-which are sent out especially on the first day of the week—and which are largely made up of advertising matter, which could be limited in size to the advantage alike of the postal service and of the reading public.

If newspapers were required to condense and if they were not permitted to send out these enormous advertising sheets which make up pages of nearly every Sunday newspaper published throughout the land, there would be a much greater reduction in the bulk of the second-class matter than will result from the adoption of this bill.

So as this simply strikes at a very narrow line, as it simply can affect abuses of a small character compared with the great bulk of matter which causes the deficiency in revenue, therefore we are called upon to be particularly careful not to do injustice and inflict hardship upon laudable enterprises which employ many people, which encourage industry and enterprise, which dissemi-nate valuable information, and which constantly tend to elevate and to develop the character of all the publications known as trade journals, and those devoted to any particular interest or industry, as well as any other class of publications.

Now, a considerable number of the newspapers whose names are paraded as members of the various press associations that have indorsed the bill have changed their minds with regard to this question. I am in receipt of a letter from a constituent, the publisher of an agricultural journal, which sends out thousands of copies to voluntary paid subscribers, saying, "We were at first disposed to favor it [this bill], but after a more careful study of its features we believe it would do more harm than good." I submit that that is the statement of the attitude of a very large promit that that is the statement of the attitude of a very large proportion of the publishers of the journals whose names are given as members of the trade press associations favoring the measure now under consideration.

As the masses of the people generally are interested as well in the dissemination of the newspaper as in the circulation of the letter, let us not discriminate against journals which minister to the people in the remoter sections of the country and entirely in favor of those which are established in the large cities all over the land.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. QUIGG. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Tracey].

Mr. Tracey].

Mr. Tracey.

Mr. Chairman, the arguments to which I have thus far listened in support of the bill under consideration have all been based, as far as I have been able to understand them, upon calculations averaging the cost of carrying all sorts of mail matter. Taking the whole number of pieces carried and the entire cost of maintaining the Post-Office Department, the average cost of carrying mail matter is stated to be 8½ cents a pound. This is the calculation presented by the committee. The distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, in his speech recorded in the RECORD on page 190, presents a table in which it is alleged that for the years 1887 to 1896, both inclusive, the total number of pounds of second-class matter carried was 2,097,640,300; cost of handling, 8 cents per pound, $167,811,224; receipts for handling, 1 cent per pound, $20,976,403; deficiency, $146,834,821.

Here, then, it is plainly stated that the cost of handling second-class matter is 8 cents per pound, and by inference that no one of the classes of mail matter is handled at less than 8 cents per pound. Further on the following language is used:

But some gentlemen say that this is a bill as it now stands in the interest of the express companies, and that we are driving this matter out of the hands of the Government to be carried by the express companies. Ido not care. I do not care who does the business.

Mr. Chairman, it would be immaterial who does the business unless it should be done at an increased cost to the people. But I submit if the effect of this legislation is to transfer the business now done by the Post-Office Department to the express companies, which, in the absence of the only competition possible, increases which, in the absence of the only competition possible, increases the cost of transportation and handling to the people, the legisla-tion is unwise and ought to be defeated. That the bill under con-sideration would have that effect appears to be recognized by the chairman of the committee, and he answers by saying he does not

Now, Mr. Chairman, it would seem to me that no argument should be necessary to convince anyone that the cost of carrying the different classes of mail matter varies materially. If the argument adduced from the position taken and the assumptions made finds itself based on a false assumption, then the argument itself necessarily falls to the ground. It must be apparent that the cost of handling and carrying first-class mail matter is much larger than the cost of carrying and handling second-class matter. handling of the pieces of mail matter known as first-class matter involves a large number of separate handlings. In the first place, the stamps must be printed, distributed, and canceled. Every piece of first-class mail matter passes through from three to four postmarkings. Then, in addition to that, the various distributions which do not obtain in second-class mail matter must be taken into consideration.

In handling second-class mail matter, under the present laws and regulations a large amount of the handling, perhaps one-half of it fully, is done by the publishers themselves. The publications are assorted into mail sacks for States, cities, counties, etc., and are delivered in that condition to the Post-Office Department. ment, and by it delivered to the various places along the various postal routes. It must be evident therefore that the cost of handling that class of matter is not at all equal to the cost of handling first-class matter.

But let us give an illustration of the methods of reckoning But let us give an illustration of the methods of reckoning adopted by the committee with reference to this matter. Now, it is alleged—and the attack made upon the existing law is based upon the allegation—that it costs 8½ cents per pound to carry all of this matter which it is sought by the bill to cut out of the privilege it enjoys under the present rate.

During the year ending June 30, 1894, there was an increase of 43,000,000 pounds of second-class mail matter carried. The methods of computation adopted by the committee give the expense of carrying this increase in the amount of second-class matter to the carrying this increase in the amount of second-class matter to the Department, and according to their methods of computation it must have been the sum found by multiplying 43,000,000 pounds by 8½ cents per pound, which it is alleged to have cost, or in the aggregate $3,655,000.

Now, it is shown by the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General of the same year that the total increase of the expenses of the Department was but $1,777,362.22, and that increase covered not only the cost of carrying the mails, but it covered also the cost of securing 766 new routes, representing an increase of 913.37 miles, with an actual increase in the distance traveled of 15,310,780.61 miles, and included the salaries of railway and post-office clerks necessary, and special facilities and mail equipment. The average cost of carrying the mails, per mile, for that year, is stated to have been 11.43 cents. At that rate, the cost to the Department of the increased facilities must have been $1,750,022.21. Take away from the increased cost of running the Department in that year the cost of obtaining and conducting the increased mail facilities for that year and it leaves the total increase of cost of carrying the mails at $27,340.01. And yet we are told by the committee in the face of these facts, which are in the reports cited by the committee and approved by them, that the chief cost due to the carrying of this second-class matter to which they object at the pound rate was $3,655,000.

Now, if the committee can present any sort of demonstration to the House which will unravel that problem, it will do more than has been yet done by any member of the committee and more than I believe to be within the possibilities. If the increased expense for transportation and mail service generally costs $1,777,-362.22 and the increased facilities thereby secured are valued at $1,750,022.21, how much did it actually cost the Department to carry the 43,000,000 additional pounds of second-class matter?

The cost of carrying the second-class matter is not at all what The cost of carrying the second-class matter is not at all what it is alleged to be. For the reason that I stated at the outset, a large proportion of the cost is paid by the publishers of these publications, who assort them, separate them, put them into sacks for delivery along the postal routes, at no expense to the Government other than the mere transportation and delivery by the Post-Office Department at the points of destination. It does not require a very wise carrier to understand that if he has a wagon and team capable of carrying 50 boxes of goods of any kind and he has but 40 to carry, the expense of his trip is not thereby reduced. On the contrary, the humblest drayman understands that the offer of 10 additional boxes would increase his receipts without increasing his expenses (wear and tear excepted). In fact, it would be just that much money found.

I have not time to say all that I should like to say upon this bill. Itseems to me that, instead of having the title which is given to it, it ought to be entitled "A bill to tax the dissemination of intelligence among the people."

While there have been and are abuses which ought to be remedied in the administration of the postal system, it is unquestionably true that under the operation of existing laws and regula-tions the United States leads the world in the production of newspapers and periodicals of the highest grade and at the lowest prices. The publishing business of the country is not conducted as a charity; it is a business, and is engaged in and conducted for a profit. When the profit ceases the business fails or is abandoned. The postage is an item of expense that is taken into account as is any other item of expense. Had this bill been in operation during the past twenty years the magnificent daily newspapers now published at 1 cent per copy in all parts of the country, a mirror of the world's doings up to the hour of going to press, would have been an "iridescent dream." If there were no other objection to the bill, this ought to be sufficient to insure its defeat.

But it strikes a harder blow, if possible, at the country newspapers, which, at best, have a hard row to hoe. And the country newspapers are entitled to the highest consideration in any legislation which proposes to change existing postal laws and regula-tions. The right to send out sample copies, the right to send a copy free to a friend, the right to exchange with other papers, the right to continue a subscription after the time paid for has expired, the right to offer as an inducement for additional subscribers a premium in the shape of a supplement containing some work of fiction, the right to combine his own paper with some metro-politan weekly which is furnished at a very low price, are all politan weekly which is furnished at a very low price, are all regarded as valuable, and, speaking from personal experience, they are valuable. All of these rights are jeopardized by this bill, if they are not entirely swept away. It is not a hazardous prediction to say that if this bill becomes a law the country press, the mainstay of patriotism and devotion to free institutions among the masses of the people, will be weakened financially and weakened in its ability for good. The splendid country weeklies of today, carrying to the homes of the people each week a volume of excellent and varied information, will in all probability be reduced to the decrepit weeklies of a quarter of a century ago, in which were merely chronicled the sayings and doings of the neighborhoods in which they were published. This would be a calamity. The bill proposes to drive out of the second class into the third class, or out of the mails entirely, all books or reprints of books, whether they be issued complete or in parts, whether they be bound or unbound, whether they be sold by subscription or otherwise, or whether they purport to be premiums or supplements or wise, or whether they purport to be premiums or supplements or parts of regular newspapers; all sample copies of newspapers or periodicals; all exchange copies of newspapers or periodicals; all copies sent free by the publisher; all unsold copies returned to news companies or to the publishers. And in addition to all this, it invests the Post-Office Department with supreme power to adopt such rules and regulations for the determination of any question. such rules and regulations for the determination of any question affecting the right of a newspaper or periodical to be carried in the mails as second-class matter as practically creates a press censorship; narrows the field now occupied by a large portion of the press of the country, and necessarily cripples its usefulness. All this is proposed in the interest of economy in the service, upon a theory which has been shown to be visionary and unsound.

Third-class matter costs the Government to handle more than double what it costs to handle second-class matter. It covers printed matter other than periodical publications. In addition to the handling and furnishing and canceling of stamps, the packages must be handled and sorted, both at the office of deposit and that of delivery. The mails are used as a rule only to send small packages, or to places remote from the railroads, and which are not reached by the express companies.

The express companies carry this class of matter to practically all of their delivery points, under a special "printed-matter" rate, at 2 cents per package less than the mail rate. The rate is adverat 2 cents per package less than the mail rate. The rate is advertised as 10 cents for each 1½ pounds or less, and for single packages exceeding 1½ pounds, 1 cent for each additional 2 ounces. The third-class mail rate for 1½ pounds is 12 cents, and 1 cent for each additional 2 ounces or fraction. This "printed-matter" rate was evidently adopted by the express companies for the purpose of securing the handling of all such matter as can be handled profitably, leaving to the Government the handling of packages costing less than 10 cents per package, or destined to remote points not reached by the companies. This becomes very apparent when it is remembered that the "printed-matter" rate was not the result of competition among the companies, but was a "pool" agreement among them. For the year ending June 30, 1894, the pieces of third-class matter carried by the mails only amounted to about 12 per cent of the whole number of pieces of mail carried, and the percentage has not increased very much, if any, since. Under the operation of this bill, should it become a law, all of the matter transferred from the second class to the third class which can be profitably handled will be carried by the express companies profitably handled will be carried by the express companies.

When the declaration of the chairman of the committee that "he does not care" is remembered, along with the significant fact that the express companies are all for the bill, is it wholly unwarrantable to inquire if the bill is not framed rather in the interest of the express companies than of the people? If the express companies continue to handle the profitable third-class matter, which they will do as long as they have a cheaper rate, how will the increase of third-class matter through the transfer to that class of matter now in the second class decrease the deficit in the revenues of the Department? Since it costs about as much to operate a postal car carrying 10 tops of mail as it does when it carries 20 tops. of the Department? Since it costs about as much to operate a postal car carrying 10 tons of mail as it does when it carries 20 tons, inasmuch as the operating expenses of the Department are not seriously decreased by a decrease in the amount of mail handled, the question of how this bill enacted into law will enable the Post-Office Department to become self-sustaining becomes a problem which will probably wait for a solution until it is demonstrated which will probably wait for a solution until it is demonstrated how one 1 from 2 leaves 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have permission to extend my remarks slightly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty minutes remaining.

Mr. QUIGG. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Morse].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Morse] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, before the holiday recess I was rather inclined to vote for this bill, but since the recess I have received some additional light, and I think now I shall vote against it. Mr. desk is covered this morning with letters from certific My desk is covered this morning with letters from constituents, and they are not machine letters either, protesting against the passage of this bill, and it seems very clear that if it corrects any wrongs it creates greater ones. The country papers, and particularly the religious papers, get subscribers by sending out sample copies of their publications. This bill denies to religious papers the privilege which they have heretofore had in this direction of the protection of the protection which they can not afford and tion, except at a rate of postage which they can not afford, and the same to local papers out of the county in which they are printed.

I suspect, Mr. Chairman, that if this bill shall pass it will be followed by a bill in the interests of the express companies to increase the postage on merchandise. When you talk about patriotic measures, about measures to cement the Union together, I do not believe there is any single measure that goes so far to the company of the larger as a low rate. inspire patriotism and love of country and the flag as a low rate of postage upon printed matter and merchandise. I do not care a snap nor a pinch of snuff whether the Post-Office Department pays or not. Who gets the benefit of a low rate of postage, if it does not pay the Government, except the people, and the poorest of our people at that? The United States post-office is a great national blessing, and I would extend and not reduce this great

As stated by the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud], there may be some objectionable matter that has gone and is going through the mails under the provisions of existing law, but I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of matter going through the mails that is not objectionable. I want to say to you that log cabins on the prairie have standard works on little shelves which they would never have had; that they have reprints of the classics which the boys and young men and young women can read which they never would have had but for the provisions of existing law. I say if the bill corrects any wrongs, it creates greater ones.

I will use the balance of my time in reading two letters, among many covering my desk, protesting against the passage of this bill. The first is as follows:

BOSTON, December 30, 1890.

DEAR SIR: We fully believe all that is urged against the bill referred to in the inclosed. We know that it would practically ruin our business, and cause the suspension of thousands of useful publications throughout the country, We look to you confidently to do everything in your power to defeat the measure. With thanks for past favors,

We are, faithfully, yours,

KASSON & PALMER.

Hon. E. A. MORSE.

The other letter is from the publishers of a religious paper. It is as follows:

THE EVANGELIST PUBLISHING COMPANY, New York, January 5, 1897.

My Dear Sir: The Loud postal bill (H+R. 4566), which is to be acted upon by your body on Wednesday, is a vicious attack upon publishers to prevent them from sending out sample copies in order to add new subscribers to their lists. It will break upand destroy the religious papers of this country. Under this bill, as is constantly the case, parties send for back numbers to complete files; it would be practically a prohibition, except at rates which would be ruinous to publishers. I hope you will see your way clear to oppose any such legislation.

With kindest regards, I am, very truly, yours,

O. F. PRESBREY,

Business Manager.

Hon. ELIJAH MORSE, Washington, D. C.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, I trust that this measure will be defeated, certainly defeated f it can not be amended in such a way as to remove these objections which I have raised.

tions which I have raised.

If I have any time remaining I yield it back to the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG].

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I think there are some features of what is called the Loud bill that deservedly appeal to the consideration and wise action of this House; but at the same time the radical features of the bill, books, or reprints of books, whether issued complete or in parts, bound or unbound, sold by subscription or otherwise, and so forth, as set forth in the first paragraph of the bill, are of a character, I think, that should not be included in the provisions of any bill, unless there is to be a general revision the provisions of any bill, unless there is to be a general revision of the rates of postage, covering all mail matter. I believe that there should be a revision of postage rates, comprehensive, covering all, making but two classes of mail matter, and as the Government has entered upon the transportation of merchandise, the rates should be at cost. There should be but two, and at most but three, divisions of the mail matter, and therefore of postage rates The drift and current of public opinion and expression during the past ten years has been to the reducing of postal rates or postages. It is within my recollection as a member of this House when the It is within my recollection as a member of this House when the rate on letter matter was 96 cents a pound, the basis of weight being half an ounce. It is to-day but 32 cents a pound, and the basis of weight upon which that rate is fixed is 1 ounce. Seeds, bulbs, roots, scions, and plants are by the act of July 28, 1888, made mailable at the third-class rate, or 8 cents a pound—reduced from the old rate of merchandise at 16 cents a pound.

We have also by radical legislation during the last fifteen years We have also by radical legislation during the last lifteen years changed from the old system of newspaper postage under the quarterly payment to pound rate. The act of June 23, 1874, established a pound rate, and fixed the postage on newspapers at 2 cents per pound and on periodicals at 3 cents per pound. In 1879 we changed the law, and by the act of March 3 of that year fixed a uniform rate of 2 cents per pound on newspapers and periodicals. In the act of March 3, 1885, Congress reduced the rate of postage on second-class matter to 1 cent per pound. The following table shows the amount of mail matter that has been carried at 1 cent per pound since July 1, 1885.

* Decrease.

At the period of this legislation I was a member of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads, and heartily concurred in the reduction; and why? Simply because we had recognized for many years past that the Post-Office Department is one of the great aiders or abettors of the Government in the education of the people. We have recognized that resultant in every change we have made with reference to newspaper, magazine, and periodical publications. It is not only in the postal laws, but in the whole trend of the Government administration and policies that we have appropriated liberally for the cause of humanity and educahave appropriated liberally for the cause of humanity and educa-

Congress has never assumed that the Post-Office Department should be a paying Department. Its legislation always looked to efficiency and conveniences for the people rather than revenue. It is under the Constitution a Government obligation for the people, and in addition to that, by legislation, it is wisely for the education of the people, whenever that result can be secured by an adjustment of postal rates.

What do we do as a Government for the cause of humanity and education? What do we do that brings back any specific revenue return for the gifts of the Government for education? I have the bills in my hand for the admission of Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico. In the bill admitting these Territories as States we give one-ninth of all the public lands in the Territory for the support one-ninth of all the public lands in the Territory for the support of common schools; we give 64,000 acres of public lands for the public buildings at the capital; 48,080 acres of public lands for establishing the University of Utah; 110,000 acres of public lands for the use of the University of Utah; 200,000 acres of public lands for use of the agricultural college; 5 per cent of the net proceeds of sales of all public lands in Utah to be paid to the State for the support of common schools; and so in all these bills we have given millions upon millions of the acreage of the Government for the education of their people.

What have we done and are continually doing in other legislation and governmental policies? Here within sight of the Capitol is the greatest printing office in the world, none reaching it in annual output and work. We spend almost $4,000,000 annually in that bureau, and two-thirds of its output goes direct to the people under the franking privilege of members of Congress, and people under the franking privilege of members of Congress, and what for? For education. What have we done in the development of the great West and subsidies to our Pacific railroads? According to the report of the Commissioner of Railroads for 1893, page 224, we have given 196,569,372 acres. In bonds issued to railroads, according to the report of the Commissioner of Railroads for 1896, we have given $64,623,512; interest paid by the United States thereon to June 30, 1896, $109,178,231, giving a sum total in principal and interest of $173,801,743. Of the interest paid by the United States the railroads had not repaid June 30, 1896, $53,510,467. This has been given for the development of interstate commerce, for the interchange of labor results and intercourse of our people.

Now let us see what has been given in the way of aid or loans to expositions and expenses of Government exhibits thereat:

What did we have the expositions for, so far as the Government exhibit was concerned, except for the education of the people in the use and sense of that work?

Take the Agricultural Department. The Agricultural appropriation act for the current fiscal year 1897, including $750,000 for agricultural experiment stations, $150.000 for seeds, and $883,772 for the Weather Bureau, and with other items, amounts to $3,225,532 for the year. For the support of Indian schools the Government appropriated $3,518,815, making a total appropriation for the

I could go on almost without limit making an exhibit of what we have done as a Government in the way of developing our resources, advancing our civilization, and educating our people, not by a temporary expedient, but by annual allowances and appropriations.

The gentleman from California claims his bill will result in an economy to the service and a less deficiency. He informs us all about how much is going to be saved. I submit to the gentleman that when he is making up his bill covering the appropriations for the Post-Office Department for the next fiscal year, it will not show any diminution in either estimate or appropriation. The show any diminution in either estimate or appropriation. The passage of this bill will not change his allowance by appropriation one single cent. The Postmaster-General has made a statement, which has no doubt been referred to in this debate—I have not been present, having been detained elsewhere. The Postmaster-General says that if it was not for this projected legislation he would simply, by a movement of his pen, change the rulings of the Department so as to keep from the mails the matter that he believes should not be allowed to go in at these rates, and the gentleman comes in here and says this is the remedial legislation that the bill asks for.

It goes further. My time will not admit of my entering upon

It goes further. My time will not admit of my entering upon details. I call attention to the language of the Postmaster-General in his report just sent to Congress:

That but for the hope that Congress:

That but for the hope that Congress would enact the bill now on the House Calendar, I should have taken the responsibility to modify and reverse the successive rulings through which this inroad on the service has been effected, and to exclude from the benefit of second-class rates the serial bibraries and other publications not in the policy of the law, even if within the letter of its rather loose phraseology. This would have imposed upon those who profit at the public expense by existing practices the necessity of seeking, through the courts or otherwise, the restoration of their special privileges.

The Postmaster-General, under the act of 1885, which put second-

The Postmaster-General, under the act of 1885, which put second-class matter at 1 cent a pound, could, by his own ruling, exclude from the mails the serial libraries and other publications not within the policy of the law. The responsibility rests with him. What else do we do? The gentleman talks to us about millions and millions being saved by this proposed legislation. He forgets that his bill reaches only a most limited line of second-class mail matter, a line which, as the Postmaster-General tells you, he could exclude by his own order to-day, but in the second class we send through the mails absolutely free a vast quantity of mail matter. The gentleman from California tells us that the cost of mail transportation is 8 or 8½ cents a pound. When the gentle-man makes that statement he knows that there is included in his figures the free matter which is sent through the mails for the figures the free matter which is sent through the mails for the Government, amounting to $10,000,000 annually, and upon that basis he makes his computation that the cost of carrying the mails is 8 or 8½ cents a pound. He includes, I say, the $10,000,000 that goes to the benefit of the Government in the transportation of all What do we do in the county districts? sorts of free matter. sorts of free matter. What do we do in the county districts? For almost half a century, or perhaps longer, county matter has gone free. What does that amount to? In the report of the Postmaster-General for 1896 he submits:

Of the 348,988,648 pounds of second-class matter handled during the year 52,348,348 pounds were "county-free" matter—that is, "newspapers, one copy to each subscriber in the county where same are printed in whole or in part and published"—which is carried free in the mails. This grant of free transmission is of long standing and rests on grounds of public policy which I have no disposition to question.

Fifty-two million three hundred and forty-eight thousand three hundred and forty-eight pounds "county free;" more than one-sixth of the whole amount of 1 cent a pound mail matter of the second class goes free. In money that amounts to upward of $4,000,000 a year. Why is that done? It is done on the ground of popular education. I do not take exception to it, but when the gentleman talks about saving millions, and when he submits to this Congress a report starting out with a declaration which he carries through in no particular, but which should be carried through if you are going to revise your rates of postage, I feel bound to call attention to these facts. What does the gentleman submit in his report? He says:

Your committee desire to be pardoned for a seeming larceny of expression, but can not refrain from trespassing upon the quotation of our illustrious President, and will assume what is an apparent fact, that we are very seriously confronted with the practical results of a "theory" in the management of the Post-Office Department. We assume it to be the duty of the Government to not alone treat all of its citizens in theory alike, but to do so in fact by actual practice.

And then the gentleman goes on with the detail of his report upon the bill. There is nothing in his bill, and the gentleman dare not include in his bill anything affecting the 52,000,000 pounds of "county-free" matter, amounting to upward of $4,000,000 annually, as he ought to do, upon his principle that what is due to one is due to all.

Take the upward of 20,000 publications, daily, weekly, semiweekly, monthly, quarterly, and so on; the gentleman dare not deal with them on the basis of his declaration in his report that what is good for one is good for all, and that what is just for one is just for all, or, to use his exact language, "We assume it to be the duty of the Government to not alone treat all of its citizens in theory alike, but to do so in fact by actual practice." He dare not, and he does not impinge in his bill upon the rights or privileges of a single one of these periodical publications. And yet the gentleman comes in here and states that it costs 8½ cents a pound to transport all mail matter, and he makes that the ground for this proposed legislation, while at the same time his bill does not touch the great body of these daily, weekly, semiweekly, and other publications. The gentleman, therefore, predicates his report upon a statement which he does not carry out in any provision of his bill. If you are going to divest the Post-Office Department of its educational purposes, then let all who send matter through the mails pay alike, making that proper variance in your rates which is demanded by the requirements of the service wherein the necessity for larger and stricter care shall be more largely charged for, but let the business be equalized all around.

Now, what does this bill propose? The Loud bill contains two serious propositions. The gentleman proposes to exclude from the mails, as second-class matter carried at the 1 cent a pound rate, what are called serial publications. Now, a serial publication can be made up of any line of matter not forbidden by law to be carried through the mails. Shakespeare, the Bible, any of the standard works, any kind of matter not in violation of the law of Congress with reference to transportation through the mails, can be issued in serial form. Why should it not be so? Why should not I be permitted to subscribe to Harper's serial or to Lippincott's serial as well as to Harper's Magazine or Lippincott's Magazine? Lippincott's Magazine every month prints a novel covering from 80 to 100 pages. That novel can go through the mails in the magazine at 1 cent a pound, but the moment it is taken out of that publication and sent to subscribers it is to pay 8 cents a pound.

[Here the hammer fell.]
Mr. LOUD. I will yield the gentleman five minutes more if he

Mr. BINGHAM, I thank the gentleman, but I will content myself with asking permission to elaborate my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding with this debate I wish to make a statement regarding a journal known as the Youth's Companion. The proprietor, a gentleman of the old school, high-minded, noble in his instincts, and is above seeking to defraud any individual, much less the Government of his country, assumes that we made an invidious distinction regarding his journal in alluding to it in our report wherein we refer to the great weight of and loss to the Government in sending out a special edition of a Christmas number.

Now, in justice to him, let me say that nothing of that character was intended, but used simply as an illustration of the great weight of matter sent through the mails. The Youth's Companion simply did what most of the legitimate publishers of this country have done, are doing to-day, and will continue to do under this bill, and no special criticism was intended of this most estimable journal, which we commend to the youth of the land. In justice to ourselves, permit me to say, however, that we did not think at the time, nor do we now, that that sort of special edition should be allowed to pass through the mails at pound rates, for the special matter is purely advertising. It was refused admission, then admitted by the Postmaster-General, and I assume that it will continue, for we do not change the law; yet we readily acquit the Youth's Companion of any attempt to defraud the mail service. It is too reputable a journal and managed by a gentleman of too high character to even think of such practices.

Mr. Chairman, one thing regrettable to me more than anything else is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Bingham] and myself, after having stood side by side on this floor almost alone in many a hard-fought battle, are now compelled to part company upon this question. I have great admiration for his courage and great respect for his ability in relation to post-office matters. He has made an argument here which does not, of course, appeal to my mind, but in superficially covering the whole ground it will appeal strongly to the minds of many members of this House.

The gentleman, I think, however, unintentionally—I will give

The gentleman, I think, however, unintentionally—I will give him credit for sincerity by using the word "unintentionally"—referred time and again, with all the emphasis that repetition could give, to the supposed inconsistency contained in my report or in the report of the committee. And he pointed his finger at me and said, "The gentleman dare not impose this penalty upon county-free matter and upon the great press of this country." I think the gentleman did not intend that remark for me. He knows well that that is my true inherent position. But when you are seeking to accomplish anything by legislation, he knows as well as any other gentleman on this floor that you must concede to conditions. You must in this country of ours have certain support with you. I might say that to accomplish good at times you must even compromise with the devil. I "dare not!" It is my position to-day—well defined, as the gentleman knows. If I had the power, I would impose upon every branch of mailable matter the amount that it costs the Government to handle and transport it. But the gentleman well knows that we must be practical in all propositions. The gentleman, perhaps, can satisfy his conscience in voting against this measure, because we will not extend it over all the publications of this country.

tions of this country.

I will not quarrel with the gentleman, however, about his conscience or about what may be the sentiment of his own people. He is courageous and fearless; he must be the judge of his own course as well as accept the consequences. I shall do the same. Outside of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with all due respect to the many gentlemen who have discussed this question, only the gentleman from New York has touched the question at issue before the House to-day. My friend from-Pennsylvania on the other side [Mr. Wanger], following the lead of a gentleman from somewhere else, claims that this is an attempt on the part of the President of the United States—a conspiracy, if you please, on the part of the President of the United States, the Postmaster-General, and the Post-Office Committee of the House to take the management and distribution of our mail matter out of the hands of the people and place it in the hands of a few private individuals and corporations. Why, sir, nothing of the sort is attempted, and that phase of the case is as pertinent to the measure up for discussion before us as many other points that have been made.

One gentleman yesterday dwelt at great length upon this phase of the question. One gentleman, sir, from somewhere—I do not know where—alluded to the position taken by the chairman of the committee intimating that he the each consuitator of the

One gentleman yesterday dwelt at great length upon this phase of the question. One gentleman, sir, from somewhere—I do not know where—alluded to the position taken by the chairman of the committee, intimating that he, the arch conspirator of this case, was seeking to take the management of the Post-Office Department out of the hands of the people. Oh, I felt so tired; that feeling of weariness and lassitude overcame me, and I said "bah!" but consoled myself with the thought that the self-styled champion and guardian of the common people was still following the course pursued for many years, was demagoging—playing to the gallery—to the end of his public career.

This is a greater question, Mr. Chairman, than a matter of personality. If the chairman of the committee on the floor of this

This is a greater question, Mr. Chairman, than a matter of personality. If the chairman of the committee on the floor of this House has objected to the private pension bill or the private claim of any person, if he can satisfy his conscience because of that fact to vote against this bill, why then he must take the consequences, not I. This is a measure, permit me to say, of greater importance than that. And it makes no difference who advocates it. If it be right, if it be based upon equity and sound business principles, then it should pass. If it be wrong, if the position assumed by the Post-Office Committee here does not appeal to your sense of justice and right, then, regardless of any local influence that may be exercised upon your minds, it is your duty to vote against the measure.

We are here as legislators of the great people of this country, not here to protect the interests of a small business college which happens to be located in our town. Neither are we here to protect the individual interests of any newspaper published in our district. Let me say to you again, if the propositions advanced here be right, then they should be sustained by this House; and if wrong, they should fall.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. Quige]—I took some notes of what he said yesterday—dwelt at great length upon the amount of saving which would result from the passage of this bill. He finally stopped, I think, at $2,000,000. He criticised at great length some possible slip of the tongue regarding figures made by the chairman of the committee in a former debate. Yet, let me say to the gentleman if he carefully scans his own remarks this morning in talking about a paper called Comfort, he will find this statement:

Comfort, now published in the city of Augusta-

This paper pays more than $6,000 a month for first-class or letter postage.

He pays $2,000 a month to the Government to take his paper and spread it broadcast.

More than $8,000 a month, according to this statement, is paid-More than $8,000 a month, according to this statement, is paid—where? At the place of publication of this paper, where it must be paid. Yet, permit me to say to the gentleman that the receipts of the post-office at Augusta never yet equaled $90,000 a year. This very paper that the gentleman held up for our inspection paid, it would seem, $96,000 of the $89,000 received at that office!

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. QUIGG. I told the gentleman yesterday that this newspaper maintained an editorial office in the city of Boston. I do not know, of course, whether it buys its postage stamps in Boston paper maintained an editorial office in the city of Boston. I do not know, of course, whether it buys its postage stamps in Boston or Augusta. I should have supposed, however, that they were purchased at the place of publication of the paper; but it does not necessarily follow that they may not be purchased in Boston.

Mr. LOUD. The presumption is that they are purchased at the place of publication.

Mr. LOUD. The presumption is that they are purchased at the place of publication.

Mr. QUIGG (continuing). At all events either at Boston or Augusta; and the gentleman can verify the facts which I have stated as to the amount of postage paid by that publication.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman from California will permit me, I find on one of the letter heads or advertisements of Comfort this language.

fort this language:

Send all letters and remittances to the home office, Augusta, Me.

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Why, the gentleman from New York well knows that the rules of the Post-Office Department require the mailing of newspapers at the office of publication.

Mr. QUIGG. Undoubtedly. They are mailed where published; but it does not follow that the $6,000 of first-class postage was not paid at Boston or Augusta, or at both. There is no occasion to dispute the statement of this man.

Mr. LOUD. Benkers, but let me say to the gentlemen from

Mr. LOUD. Perhaps; but let me say to the gentleman from New York that there are other papers published in Augusta; and I have great sympathy for the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLI-

I have great sympathy for the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN], because I know his better judgment tells him that this bill, in its every letter, is proper and just to the great American people.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I will say that I do not need the gentleman's sympathy. If he will be just, it is all I ask.

Mr. LOUD. That is what I propose to be, in so far as I am able.

I want to say a word further, however, in reference to this same point. Let us take as a starting point the fact that the city of Augusta, Me., with a population of 10,500, mails more than 2 per cent of all the second-class mail matter in this country.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That shows its enterprise.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That shows its enterprise.
Mr. LOUD. So that this paper Comfort is not the only paper published there. Why, Mr. Chairman, Vickery & Hill's list shows a guaranteed circulation outside of Comfort of 1,532,500. Brooks has a list, as you well know; and there are other publications there.

If you look at the Third Assistant Postmaster-General's report a startling fact confronts you. You find that as the ninth city on the list for mailing second-class publications appears that beautiful, rich, and wealthy city of Augusta, Me., with a population of but

Mr. MILLIKEN. If the gentleman will allow me a single word. I do not wish to be impertinent in interrupting him, but I would like to know if the gentleman from California thinks that city ought to be condemned for its enterprise?

Mr. LOUD. Not at all.

Mr. LOUD. Not at all. Mr. MILLIKEN (continuing). Or that Augusta ought to be

Mr. MILLIKEN (continuing). Or that Augusta ought to be proscribed for patronizing the mails as it does?

Mr. LOUD. By no means. I wish to commend the city.

Mr. MILLIKEN. A word more. Augusta has not only patronized the mails of the country perhaps greater than any other city of its population, but it has sent to this House and to the other end of the Capitol, and into the Cabinet, more brains than were ever furnished by any other city, big or little, throughout the country.

[Applause.]
Mr. LOUD. Oh, very well: I will let you put all that into the RECORD, and all the rest of it you want to, and will say amen. There is no doubt of the truth of the statement of the gentleman, and I do not desire to dispute it in any way.

I reiterate that I do not desire to make any invidious insinuations against the city of Augusta. It is to be commended for the fact that more than 2 per cent of the second-class mail matter is mailed in a city where the receipts of the postal service is less

The city of Augusta comes next to my own city in the amount of second-class matter mailed, and yet the receipts of the post-office where I reside are more than $700,000 a year. Notwith-standing that fact, it mailed but a trifle more of second-class matter than the city of Augusta, where the receipts are but

Mr. MILLIKEN. They are behind the times out in the gentleman's city.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes; I know that. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] said yesterday that this bill would not save the amount of money estimated by the committee. Well, I do not care whether it will save the amount committee or not. We are only giving our judgestimated by the committee or not. We are only giving our judgment, and do not claim to be infallible. If we take the estimates of Postmaster-General Wanamaker, in 1892, in which he stated, in his report, that there was mailed that year 50,000 tons of serial novels, then we must come to the conclusion that in that year we lost more than $13,000,000 in the transmission of serial novels alone, and there has been an increase of 25 per cent in second-class matter since then. Or we may take the estimate made by the same gentleman, in which he figures the loss on one publication at $2,000, and then compare his statement with one made by Postmaster-General Bissell, in which he said that there were more than 24,000 second-class entries in four years, and that the most reliable newspaper directories in the country gave an increase of only 3,157. Taking that statement, we must necessarily come to the conclusion that more than 20,000 of those entries were illegitimate—that the publications had passed out of existence, or were not classed among the legitimate publications in this country.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow a statement in that connection?

connection?

Mr. LOUD. Why, certainly.
Mr. BINGHAM. I have sent the memoranda to the Reporters' desk, but from the Post-Office Department I have the statement desk, but from the Post-Office Department I have the statement that at the present time there are only 25,000 publications of all classes entered as second-class matter, and this includes the daily, weekly, triweekly, monthly, and quarterly publications.

Mr. LOUD. Twenty-five thousand on the list to-day?

Mr. BINGHAM. On the list to-day. I gave the gentleman a detailed statement of 20,000, coming from the regular newspaper publications, which detailed statement will appear in my remarks.

Mr. LOUD. I do not doubt the gentleman's statement. That has nothing whatever to do with the statement made by myself that 24,000 entries were made in four years, and only 3,157 were legitimate. Entries are made every day. Business men in this country are compelled to issue publications in order to protect themselves against others who pursue this course. In the busithemselves against others who pursue this course. In the business world you are brought in close competition with men who take advantage of every condition. Your adjoining neighbor issues an advertising sheet to advertise his own business. He is compelled under the law to get a few advertisements outside. He fixes his publication in such shape that it is admitted as secondclass matter. It is sent broadcast over the land at a cent a pound. It has fulfilled its mission. It goes out of existence, dies, perhaps to reappear again when the necessities of the case demand it.

Mr. QUIGG. Will the gentleman allow me a question there?

Mr. LOUD. Certainly, if the gentleman will confine it to a

Mr. QUIGG. I do not understand how that can be done under the law. Does not existing law declare that a publication designed primarily for advertising purposes shall not have admission as second-class matter?

Mr. LOUD. I can answer the gentleman's question without his

Mr. LOUD. I can answer the gentleman's question without his propounding it any further. I do not want to be rude to him, but he mentioned that matter yesterday, and I understand his inquiry. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further. Mr. QUIGG. I do not understand that he declines to yield. Mr. LOUD. I understand the point, because the gentleman made the same point yesterday. I have said before, and I will take occasion to say again, that if you can show me the man who can draw the line between the legitimate and the illegitimate, if he be a disinterested party, so as to not include himself, then I say to you that verily Christ has come again upon this earth, and a perfect man is found.

a perfect man is found.

The gentleman dwelt at length yesterday on the fact that it was unnecessary for us to enact a law when the law was already sufficient. Why, legislative bodies every day, in all parts of the country, are enacting and reenacting laws when they find that the courts are construing a law contrary to the intent, or contrary to the convictions of the legislative body.

Mr. QUIGG. But the gentleman does not change the law in the courts are construing a law contrary to the convictions of the legislative body.

Mr. QUIGG. But the gentleman does not change the law in this respect. He simply cuts out sample copies. They can go on and perpetrate that fraud just as easily as they do now.

Mr. LOUD. But permit me to say that the gentleman knows:

as well as I do that I do not seek to change the law restricting the legitimate. Yet the gentleman intimated in very strong language yesterday that this bill would strangle the publishing interests of this country.

Mr. QUIGG. Why, so it will.

Mr. LOUD. This bill does not seek to change the law governing that. But much has been said about the power contained in this bill, vesting in the Postmaster-General greater censorship over the press. Why, it is the merest rot, and the gentleman knows it better than any member of this House, for there is to-day knows it better than any member of this House, for there is to-day vested in the Postmaster-General, by reason of necessity, absolute power over the admission and circulation of second-class matter. This bill seeks to contract the power vested in him. This bill seeks to limit the power vested in him by stating emphatically what matter shall not hereafter be mailable at the pound rate. The gentleman dwelt yesterday at considerable length on the fact that the present chairman of the Post-Office Committee would not make the showing, in the bill brought into the House, of the saving claimed in his bill. That is not really pertinent to the question under consideration, Mr. Chairman, because the committee could not bring a bill into this House to meet the demands question under consideration, Mr. Chairman, because the committee could not bring a bill into this House to meet the demands of this bill until the bill became a law. But I will be perfectly frank to the gentleman, as I hope I have been to every other member of this House. If I am wrong, I want to be convinced of that fact. The effects of the reform contemplated by this bill can not be felt immediately. If this bill were to become a law to-morrow, I should not, in my official capacity, recommend the dismissal of clarks in the post offices of letter carriers of railway mail clarks. I should not, in my official capacity, recommend the dismissal of clerks in the post-offices, of letter carriers, of railway mail clerks, but, in my capacity as chairman of that committee, I should urge with all my ability that the increased amount asked for this year for railroad transportation, nearly $2,000,000; the increase of post-office clerks, over $600,000; the increase of railway mail clerks, over $400,000; the increase in the amount asked for letter carriers, nearly $600,000, be stricken from the bill that would be considered by this body. And let me say to you further, in full frankness, that if this bill should become a law, its full effect can not be felt for four years.

The full effect of this bill can not be felt until the quadrennial weighing shall have been fully completed, which will take three years; and its effect, permit me to say, will be felt so gradually along the line that no one will be an immediate sufferer. Of course it is easy to ascertain within a few million dollars what the Government is going to save in transportation. My friend from Government is going to save in transportation. My friend from Missouri [Mr. Tracey] occupied ten or fifteen minutes saying it costs us more to transmit one class of matter than it does to transmit another. Now, the gentleman has fallen into the same error as the so-called Publishers' Association did last year—that this committee had taken into consideration the items of transportation and handling, yet the committee has confined itself in its report exclusively to the cost of transportation, because it was one easy to be ascertained, and we did not enter the field of handling. Permit me to say, with great respect to the gentleman from Missouri, his remarks are not pertinent to this question. The cost of handling is one that I understand no man can arrive at accurately; but it costs as much to transmit a pound of newspapers as it does to transmit a pound of registered first-class matter. We pay so much per pound per mile for transportation, and it is one of the simplest problems in arithmetic for us to ascertain what it costs to transmit all our matter, and then how much it costs to trans-to transmit all our matter, and then how much it costs to transmit second-class matter per pound.

Now, then, when it comes to the field of handling, we have placed it at an estimate of 4 cents a pound, which is most conservative. Gentlemen might ask me why I put it at that. The report of Postmaster Bissell will show—mark me closely, because you should understand these things—that more than one-third of the total number of pieces of all mail matter handled in 1894 was second class. The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] must second class. The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] must admit that it costs the Post-Office Department as much—he knows well that it costs more—to handle one piece of second-class matter as it costs to handle one piece of first-class matter. I have had experience in the post-office. I can route ten letters hour by hour for distribution quicker than you can a piece of second-class matter. It is the same with the letter carriers and the same with the relived would class. railroad mail clerks. Now, then, when I put the estimate at 4 cents I am very conservative. One-third of the total cost of the Post-Office Department outside of transportation is legitimately chargeable to second-class matter.

Mr. QUIGG. You mean 4 cents a pound for the cost of transportation?

Mr. LOUD. No; 4 cents for handling. Mr. QUIGG. Oh! for handling. I think that is very conserva-

Mr. LOUD. Is not that very conservative?
Mr. QUIGG. I think so.
Mr. LOUD. So then, one-third of the total expense of the Post-Office Department to-day, outside of the cost of transportation, is legitimately chargeable to second-class matter. It costs us, in round numbers, $51,000,000; and then I put it at $17,000,000. That is very conservative. It is probably over $20,000,000; and to put it at $17,000,000 is a conservative estimate of what is chargeable to second-class matter. I will be conservative in another estimate. One-third of the second-class matter going through the mails to-day—the gentleman well knows that the great New York dailies and the great metropolitan journals are distributed by express within the limit of 500 miles to a great extent, and the Government does not get any of it. Now, I will make this estimate, and the gentleman knows it is a conservative one. I believe that one-third of the second-class matter now going through the mails will be eliminated by this bill.

Mr. QUIGG. Why does not the gentleman prove that? The Post-Office Department must have the figures, and if the gentleman's statement is correct he certainly can prove it.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, yes; in the course of a few years.

Mr. QUIGG. But the gentleman's estimates are—

Mr. LOUD. I must decline to be interrupted further at this time. I will even take the statement of the gentlemen who are most interested in this matter—gentlemen who spent last winter here looking after this business, the assumed "Publishers' Association." They are more interested and ought to know about this ciation." They are more interested and ought to know about this better than anyone else, and they have charged that this bill will eliminate from the mails 100,000 tons of this matter. I believe that is all "rot," and they, in their revised statement, take it back; so I will be conservative and say that one-third of the second-class matter now going through the mails will either be eliminated or will pay us 8 cents a pound. Why not? The policy of this Government toward the legitimate press of the country has been to encourage it, and I am willing to accept that policy; but why, I ask, should the legitimate advertising of a business man—advertising, and nothing but advertising—be carried through the mails at the pound rate? Why, Mr. Chairman, it is debauching public sentiment. If I, as a merchant, seek to pursue an honest career, and if somebody else adopts methods by which the Government is made use of to aid his business in competition with mine, then it is evident that I must adopt the same course, or else must go out of business. ciation." They are more interested and ought to know about this else must go out of business.

Gentlemen have placed their defense of the existing policy upon educational grounds. Now, I do not care to deal specially with the book part of this question. I will merely say in passing that there is involved in it a great moral question, which I do not care to discuss at this time. I hold in my left hand a book, probably a very estimable publication, by the Hon. M. W. HOWARD. I have never read it, but it must be an estimable work, because its author is commended to our consideration by the present Vice-President of the United States and by a gentleman signing himself David B. Hill, Senator from New York.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MORSE. The gentleman does injustice to the Vice-President. Gentlemen have placed their defense of the existing policy upon dent.

Mr. LOUD. I am perfectly willing to admit, Mr. Chairman, that this is probably a work of high standing, but permit me to say that the name of Howard has not yet attained to such eminence in the literary world as the name of the author of this other book, Ivanhoe, by Sir Walter Scott, that great man whose works we all delight to read and reread. Gentlemen tell us that this system of cheap postage has given cheap books to the people. Well, If Christ Came to Congress costs 50 cents, I suppose there is some extra charge for this encircling of a serpent around faces which some of us might recognize. At all events, the book costs 50 cents. On the other hand, I have bought a copy of Sir Walter Scott's Ivanhoe, bound, for 25 cents, and could purchase ten copies for $3, yet Scott's work, Ivanhoe, going through the mails must pay 8 cents a pound, while If Christ Came to Congress is carried for 1 cent a pound.

pay 8 cents a pound, while If Christ Came to Congress is carried for 1 cent a pound.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Now, is that difference made because Ivanhoe is Scott's work, or is it because the work is bound?

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman knows why it is made.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Of course I do. I simply wanted to know whether my friend knew. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. Well, the gentleman can take me out after a while and tell me. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. I fear that I should have to spend too much time in making the gentleman understand. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOUD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have here a lot of these papers, Vickery & Hill's list: Good Stories, Happy Hours, Hearth and Home, and so on, guaranteed circulation 1,522,500; Yankee Blade, 100,000; American Nations, 100,000; Fireside Gem, 150,000 circulation. Here is one published right in Washington with a guaranteed circulation of 150,000.

Mr. BOWERS. I never saw one of those publications.

Mr. BOWERS. I never saw one of those publications.
Mr. LOUD. No; and I venture to say that there is not a gentleman in this House who ever saw or even heard of any of them

Mr. BOWERS. I have never seen a copy of any one that you have mentioned.

Mr. LOUD. Read them and you will come to the conclusion that they are published primarily for advertising purposes, but when the question is presented to the average mind the line of distinction is so faint that you will feel bound to call upon him who is wholly without sin to cast the first stone. Mr. Chairman, the Post-Office Department to-day is holding up its hands calling for assistance. It is powerless to stem the growth of the tide of "fake" newspapers in this country by reason of the sample-copy privilege. Why, gentlemen, if you could read what I have read during the two years that I have been specially interested in this orbits if you could read the hundreds of thousands of letters during the two years that I have been specially interested in this subject, if you could read the hundreds of thousands of letters that I have received from people all over the United States, it would appall you. Munro, the publisher of one library, has just entered at New York and is sending of one publication more than 2 tons a day through the mails. There is one of his publications, I do not know at this moment which one it is, a sample paper, which he guarantees to advertisers to have a circulation of 25,000,000. Think of it! A guaranteed circulation of 25,000,000. Yet it is a paper that circulates not to subscribers. It is what I regard as a legitimate advertising sheet; and I have no objection regard as a legitimate advertising sheet; and I have no objection to the Government transmitting it as advertising matter.

Are papers published to-day for sentiment? What does Comfort get for advertising? Four thousand dollars a page, one insertion!

insertion!

Mr. MILLIKEN. Why not? It is a good advertising medium.

Mr. LOUD. Yes; but why should it not pay for its transmission through the mail? Why should the Government be engaged with it in disseminating its legitimate advertising throughout the length and breadth of this land? What sustains these papers and magazines? Look at this list and see their rates of advertising—The Century, $250 a page; the Ladies' Home Journal, $4,000 a page; Munsey's, $500 a page, and so on. Are papers sustained by the proceeds of their circulation? No; those days have gone.

Now, a few words on this question from the educational standpoint. In connection with this view of the question, I asked this House before, would you be willing to-day, if you were to inaugurate this business, to devote $25,000,000 a year for the support and furtherance of this class of educational matter? Yet that is what you are doing. We are not seeking to eliminate totally this what you are doing. We are not seeking to eliminate totally this class of mail matter. Let me say to my friend from Pennsylvania that personally I am seeking to go as far as I can, recognizing the conditions that confront us

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?
Mr. LOUD. I have only two minutes left.
Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, I will not take any part of the gentleman's two minutes; I presume he will need them.
Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, this subject presents a great field of discussion. I should perhaps have had a little more time; but probably the House has heard as much as is necessary upon the question. Very few members have remained here to listen to the debate. I suppose they are perfectly satisfied regarding the merits of this case. Whatever may be the fate of this bill (and in a short time it will be determined), permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, in all sincerity, to this House, more than a million anxious hearts to-day are watching for the result. Whatever may be the result to-day, the great principles of justice and truth and equity contained in this measure, like all great truths, must continue to march forward until we have attained in the end a better, a nomarch forward until we have attained in the end a better, a no-bler, a purer press—so admitted by most if not all the legitimate publishers of the country—a press that fulfills the original mission anticipated by the press—a press of high standard, devoted to the elevation of mankind, and not, as is its present tendency, the de-bauching of public sentiment. [Applause.] The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate on this bill has expired under the order of the House. The bill will now be read by sections for amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That mailable matter of the second class shall embrace all newspapers and other periodical publications which are issued at stated intervals, and as frequently as four times a year, and are within the conditions named in sections 3 and 4 of this act: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate publications purporting to be issued periodically and to subscribers, but which are merely books, or reprints of books, whether they be issued complete or in parts, whether they be bound or unbound, whether they be sold by subscription or otherwise, or whether they purport to be premiums or supplements or parts of regular newspapers or periodicals.

Mr. QUIGG. I move to amend by striking out after the word "three," in line 6, the word "and," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "or."

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 6, after the word "three," strike out "and," and insert "or;" so as to ead: "and are within the conditions named in sections three or four of this

Mr. QUIGG. I call the attention of the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] to the fact that if this bill passes with the word "and" retained in the sixth line any periodical, in order to circulate at the second-class rate, must conform to the provisions of both section 3 and section 4; in other words, the publication must be a benevolent or fraternal organ, or the organ of a trades union, or of an order built up under the lodge system, and must also be a newspaper.

The gentleman will observe that my amendment does not interfere with his bill, because section 3 establishes the periodical character of the publication and enumerates all the statutory characteristics defined in section 4, in so far as they must relate to any fraternal paper; that is to say, it must be regularly issued and from a known office of publication, and as often as four times a year; and then, if it be a fraternal organ, it may circulate at the second-class rate. But if the word "and" be retained such a publication, for instance, as the New York Tribune must be the organ of a fraternal or benevolent association before it can go into the mails as second-class matter.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think so.

Mr. QUIGG. Certainly. Let me read the language:

Be it enacted, etc., That mailable matter of the second class shall embrace all newspapers and other periodical publications which are issued at stated intervals, and as frequently as four times a year, and are within the conditions named in sections 3 and 4 of this act.

In other words, the New York Herald must make itself out to be a fraternal and benevolent organ before it can circulate as second-class matter. This bill, as I shall show as the reading for amendment proceeds, is full of just such crudities.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. Quigg, it was adopted.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of saying a word about the pending bill.

As I understand it, and I hope the gentleman from California [Mr. Loup] will correct me if I am wrong, second-class mail matter of all kinds has substantially the franking privilege now. That is to say, the charge for postage is nominal—1 cent a pound, including country newspapers delivered absolutely free in the county where published; newspapers otherwise a cent a pound, periodicals a cent a pound, and sample copies 1 cent a pound.

Now, the gentleman seeks, if I understand this bill, to affect two kinds of this matter substantially free now—one the sample copies, and the other a class of periodicals that are reprints of books merely, in whole or part. I think I am correct, if I understand the purpose of the bill—leaving all the balance of the matter substantially free.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that the gentleman goes far enough in the proposed legislation, and I am not quite sure but that he goes a little too far. [Laughter.] I mean just what I say; so that I am rather inclined to think if he goes at all that he ought to go still further.

For instance, you take the question of sample copies of newspapers, and I read now from the gentleman's own report, which, referring to former legislation, says:

An important innovation was made by this act, in allowing sample copies the same rates as copies to subscribers, a sample copy being defined as one sent to a person not a subscriber for the purpose of inducing him to subscribe or advertise or become an agent therefor.

Now that is the propert law and I gon readily so that it would

Now, that is the present law, and I can readily see that it would be wise to restrict the use of the sample copy for trade purposes; to induce somebody to advertise, or possibly to become the agent for the periodical, both being trade purposes. But to induce him to subscribe to a periodical that goes free through the mails, I see no objection to it, if the law is right to allow it to go free, or sub-stantially free, and for reasons which are apparent. So it seems to me that there might be an amendment to allow sample copies to go through the mails for purposes of inducing subscriptions, bearing in mind that the paper itself would go at a nominal charge after it was subscribed for.

Now, I apprehend that we can not cut up this abuse—if abuse it is—by the roots, and as the business of the country has adjusted itself under former legislation, we ought to be pretty careful that we do not interfere with it arbitrarily. I will say frankly, with we do not interfere with it arbitrarily. I will say frankly, with the information I have, and going no further than the gentleman himself proposes, I am afraid to vote for the legislation, because I do not know how far it would affect the revenues of the Department. The gentleman says that there will be less matter to be carried. How much less? I do not know. I do not believe the gentleman knows. How much the first-class postage would decrease, and the correspondence would fall off, when you cut off the privilege of sample copies from the class of periodicals that the gentleman strikes out I am sure I do not know, and I do not believe the gentleman himself knows.

Another thing that is worthy of consideration. This period is Another thing that is worthy of consideration. This period is unlike any other period in the history of this country or the history of civilization.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Well, I should like to be permitted to proceed for a few moments longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Illinois will proceed for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. The introduction, Mr. Chairman, of laborsaving machinery in the business of the people, the harnessing of the forces of nature, the cheapening of products, the reorganization of labor itself, all of these things have come, and we can not stop them if we would.

Now, so far as the dissemination of information through the press is concerned, you can take the great metropolitan papers of press is concerned, you can take the great metropolitan papers of from 12 pages to 40 pages, and you buy them for 1 cent. They contain information, or misinformation as some people would say, but upon the whole, I suppose, information for the million. Well, now, 1 cent does not, as I understand it, pay for the white paper. How do they get their pay? By advertisements. I am not a publisher and do not understand the matter, but in various ways they receive a return through advertisements, and you can not very well stop it. It would be a bold man who would stop it if he had the power, unless he was quite clear that when he had substituted something else for it he was bettering the condition of

Now, I have said about all I want to about this matter. Many years ago I was heartily in favor of that policy which would cheapen good books, not bad books, to the million. Men of my age recollect when books were high and scarce. Under the operation of all these industrial and economic forces, and with the cooperation of the Post-Office Department and the publishers, great industries have been established and books have been made cheaper. You can buy bound books now for one-quarter, perhaps one-fifth, what they could have been bought for a generation ago, and they are better bound and better printed; and you can buy unbound books for a very small amount, whether printed in the shape of these periodicals or printed in connection with the daily press.

these periodicals or printed in connection with the daily press.

Now I want to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] one practical question. He would throw out those publications which are merely books or reprints of books. Now, suppose a man publishes ten lines or a page or three pages of something else, and then, if you please, puts in Dickens's Dombey and Son, or something else. Is that excluded? If so, the law means nothing. I suppose in point of fact it would not be.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to have the gentleman who is asking me the question put it in a little plainer form.

Mr. CANNON. I ask it in good faith.

Mr. LOUD. I understand that.

Mr. CANNON. The bill says:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate publications purporting to be issued periodically and to subscribers, but which are merely books, or reprints of books, whether they be issued complete or in parts—

And so on. Now, if they are books or reprints of books, they can not, as I understand it, go into the mails under the second-class rates if this bill passes; but suppose you put in a page of something

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman will read the whole section I think he will find-

Mr. QUIGG. Whether they purport to be premiums or sup-

Mr. LOUD. I tried to get time to discuss the question with the gentleman before this came up.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that; but suppose a man prints five chapters from Dombey and Son and one chapter from one of the Waverley novels, and then puts in a page of general news about half a dozen different things, would that publication be excluded?

Mr. LOUD. I assume that it would, and I think the gentleman will come to that conclusion after he reads the whole section.

Mr. CANNON. Then, suppose he puts in five pages of something else, would it be excluded?

Mr. LOUD. I think so.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose he puts in ten pages of something else, would it be excluded?

else, would it be excluded?

Mr. LOUD. I assume so. You can put in a thousand—

Mr. CANNON. Well, then, if he puts in anything from any of Dickens's publications or Thackeray's, in a periodical, he would vitiate the whole periodical or paper so it could not go as secondclass matter; and I submit to my friend that he is going to cut out what is, to my mind, the most valuable matter that is published in these periodicals, and, for that matter, in many newspapers. I think it would be better for us to go a little slow about this matter. That is the way I feel about it. Therefore I am inclined to vote "no" upon this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I desire five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts—
Mr. MORSE. I offer an amendment to strike out the last word

Mr. MORSE. I offer an amendment to strike out the last word of this section. I do so for the purpose of calling attention to a remark made by the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] in his previous speech. I think he unwittingly and unmeaningly did a great injustice to a very high officer in this Government when he said that the Vice-President of the United States indorsed the miserable Howard book, if Christ Came to Congress. That book, as I understand it, is little else than a directory of the houses of prostitution in this city, and if he will kindly read what the Vice-President says, he will see that he never did indorse that book, and probably what he wrote was written before that book was printed. I am sure the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud] does not desire to embody in the permanent Record of this House so serious a charge as he has made against the Vice-President of the United States.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment to section 1. Strike out lines 13 and 14 and insert the

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 13 and 14 and insert:
"Unless they are premiums for, supplements to, or parts of a regular newspaper or periodical."

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that under the operation of the present postal laws we have had, and now have, a class of newspapers and magazines that it would be absolutely impossible to obtain under the operation of the bill under consideration. We have in every section of the country newspapers sold at 1 cent a copy that ten years ago were not sold anywhere for less than 5 cents; and they are much better as sold anywhere 1 cent than they were then when sold at 5 cents. I undertake to say that the fact is due absolutely to the operation of the present liberal postal laws, and that a reform which begins with an attack upon the means of information, and the greatest means of information within the reach of the people, is a reform in the wrong direction.

These newspapers and magazines have been built up because These newspapers and magazines have been built up betatake of the privilege they have had under the present postal laws. They never could have been built up under the illiberal system proposed in this bill. It would be a matter of impossibility. The people as a whole have received the benefits. It has been argued here constantly that the present system is a system in the interest of the publishers. It is not in the interest of the publishers. It is a system in the interest of the common people, because it leads is a system in the interest of the common people, because it leads to the dissemination of more information upon every subject than has ever obtained either in this country or in any other country; and there is not to-day in any other nation on earth as good newspapers and periodicals furnished to the people of such country at the prices they are furnished to the people of the United States; and this is all due to the liberal postal regulations and postal laws which we have had and which we now have. I believe in reform which we have had and which we now have. I believe in reform, but I do not believe in anything that operates as a tax upon the dissemination of information and intelligence among the people. The people of this country are nearer abreast of the age in which they live than are the masses of the people in any other country in the world, and it is due to the fact that we have had this means of building up the 10-cent magazines, that circulate and that contain excellent information, are magnificently printed, and distributed by the hundred thousands among the people, and the daily newspapers containing the news of the world distributed each day to hundreds and thousands of people-millions of people-at 1 cent to hundreds and thousands of people—minions of people—at I cent per copy. The great newspapers in this country, absolutely the greatest newspapers in the world, pay more for the collection and diffusion of intelligence among the people than the newspapers of any other country in the world, and are sold at from $4 to $6 a year. Why? Simply because of the fact that they have had these privileges given to them under the present postal system, which privileges this bill would absolutely destroy.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the amend-ment so that I can understand it ment, so that I can understand it.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. LOUD. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that of course there is very little opportunity in five minutes to combat the various sentimental attacks that may be made on this bill. The merits of the question presented in this amendment should have been considered before we had gotten thus far with the measure. This amendment totally destroys the first section. The gentleman might just as well be honest, and move to strike out the first section entirely, because if you allow a paper—and that is what his amendment proposes to do—if you allow any second-class publication in the country to send as a supplement to its regular or special edition one of these books, why, then, the book dealers have accomplished all they desire in this bill, because they will simply change the particular form of sending direct to their agents, or combining with, which is done to a great extent, and sending by or through an assumed legitimate publication of this country.

Now, I simply call upon the House to vote this amendment down. I have not time-nor have you-in five minutes to present such raye not time—nor have you—in two minutes to present such considerations as to determine whether the merits of this bill be right or not. There are but two propositions in the whole measure of import. Do you desire to continue this privilege, now enjoyed by the publishers of this country, to send unbound books through the mails at a cent a pound? If you do, be honest and strike section 1 out of the bill. If you desire the iniquitous sample-copy privilege continued, which is flooding this country with privately true they have the property and have miserable trash, why, then, you should content yourself and have them continued. Permit me to say that in all candor to you, whether you favor the bill or not, if you favor the bill, then you must favor these two provisions without any amendment whatever, or else you must vote against the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It seems to me, sir, that the remarks of the chairman of the Post-Office Committee are exceedingly pertinent. This amendment does, in my judgment, destroy entirely the efficiency of this bill, for, under the cover that is furnished by the amendment, great almses will still continue, and the men who are engaged in floodbill, for, under the cover that is furnished by the amendment, great abuses will still continue, and the men who are engaged in flooding the country with objectionable mail matter will simply change the name or the form of their publications and go on. And right here, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in regard to the manner in which the opponents of this bill always hide themselves and fight their battles behind the magazines. I would be glad if the gentleman from Missouri would inform the House how this bill interferes in any way with the dissemination of the literature of which he has spoken. In what way will the rights or privileges of any of these legitimate publications to which he has referred, the new magazines that have surung into existence within the last of any of these legitimate publications to which he has referred, the new magazines that have sprung into existence within the last three or four years, be affected? Every facility that they have now will be retained, and the demand for the kind of literature they supply will be increased by the destruction of that which is sought to be destroyed through the operation of this bill.

And yet, while this is true, gentlemen who oppose this measure always bring up the magazines and ask us, "Do you want to curtail the circulation of that class of literature?" "Do you want to take away the cheap magazines from the people?" Certainly not, and the provisions of this bill do not in any way harm that kind of publication. Will not some gentleman point out, if he can and the provisions of this bill do not in any way harm that kind of publication. Will not some gentleman point out, if he can, the manner in which their circulation is to be affected by the passage of this bill? The provisions of the bill are designed to correct abuses, and they will in no way injure legitimate publications. But why should the publisher of a newspaper have the right to send as second-class matter an edition of his paper to right to send as second-class matter an edition of his paper to points hundreds of miles away, and then, in order to protect himself from the dishonesty of his agents, have the right to have the unsold copies of that edition returned to him through the mail at 1 cent a pound? The only purpose of it must be to enable him to keep watch and guard upon his own agents to see that they do not take advantage of him. The papers thus returned, amounting in weight to millions of pounds, are of no value to anyone, and the only object there can be in requiring their return is that when it is reported to the publisher that but 10 out of 100 papers have been sold, he may have evidence of the fact by the inspection of the 90 copies returned through the mails at a cost to the Governthe 90 copies returned through the mails, at a cost to the Government of 7 or 8 cents a pound. It is such abuses as this that this bill strikes at, and it does not in any way affect the magazines, behind which these gentlemen are at all times sheltering themselves while they hurl their lances at the bill.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Chairman, I only desire to say now that it would not be difficult to answer the remarks of my esteemed friend from Iowa, but inasmuch as I have no desire, and had none in offering the amendment, to continue the sending of books through the mails, if the effect of that amendment would be to continue such sending of books as second-class matter, I shall not insist upon its adoption. Of course I do not myself believe it would have that its adoption. Of course I do not myself believe it would have that effect, or I would not have offered it. So far as the books are concerned, I think I would go with the committee in excluding them from the mails at second-class rates. My only object in offering the amendment was stated in my remarks, believing that the amendment would operate as I personally know it has operated, because I have had a great deal of experience along that line. Still, if it is considered by the chairman of the committee that the adoption of that amendment would destroy section 1 of his bill, I shall not insist upon it, and, if permitted, I will withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. SIMPKINS. Mr. Chairman, in common, probably, with most of the members of this House, I have received protests against this bill, many of them signed by editors of small newspapers. I have in my hand a letter which, it seems to me, shows the animus of a good many of these printed protests, and I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The letter was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE INDEPENDENT, Sandwich, Mass., December 31, 1896.

Dear Sir: I have received the inclosed petition from a committee of New York publishers, with a request that it be forwarded to my Representative in Congress.

I understand that the bill in question is aimed at a class of publications not entitled to second-class rates. But there are some provisions of the bill that will work injustice to legitimate newspapers.

It occurs to me that the committee from whom I have heard may be the very ones whom the bill is aimed at, and that they are trying to "work" other publishers to send in a flood of petitions to Congress. However that may be, I am sure that our Representatives will not suffer to pass a bill that will in any way oripple or injure a legitimate newspaper.

Very truly, yours,

Mr. SIMPKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, that letter seems to be from an editor who did not get frightened before he was actually hurt. He did not sign the protest simply because some publishing firm in New York told him that he would be injured if this bill passed, but he seeks for legitimate information on the subject; and I wish now to ask the chairman of the Committee of Postal Affairs if this bill will work any injustice or injury to any legiti-mate newspapers?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that I will say that this bill does not amend or change the law in any particular so far this bill does not amend or change the law in any particular so far as legitimate newspapers are concerned, either as to their quality or quantity or anything of that character. It does not affect the country newspapers, which I suppose the gentleman refers to particularly, because they are specially excepted. That reminds me that I saw a brilliant editorial in a Kansas newspaper a short time ago in which the writer said in substance: "Keep your eye on Congress. Those fellows down there are trying to raise the rate to 8 cents a pound on our county-free matter." Why do not gentlemen read the bill? The bill specially excepts county-free matter. Mr. BRODERICK. Does the gentleman know the politics of that paper?

Mr. LOUD. The editor is in favor of the ownership and operation by the Government of all means of transmission and transportation. He believes in "downing" the "plutocrats" and the aristocrats.

"aristocrats."
Mr. BRODERICK. That settles it.
Mr. LOUD. He publishes that at the head of his paper.
Mr. COX. He is a free silver man, I bet. [Laughter.]
Mr. LOUD. Let me say to this House in perfect good faith that 90 per cent of the legitimate press of this country have indorsed every provision of this bill; and I believe the other 10 per cent, if they had investigated it, would have done the same thing. The bill does not restrict the legitimate privilege enjoyed.

thing. The bill does not restrict the legitimate privilege enjoyed by any paper in the country to-day.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether this bill will permit the passage of man of the committee whether this bill will permit the passage of college papers through the mails as second-class matter?

Mr. LOUD. I will say to the gentleman that this bill confers the same right upon college publications that is enjoyed by any other publication in America. It gives no special privileges. I assume, however, that what the gentleman wants to know is this—whether this bill will permit the business colleges, organized for profit as corporations, to send their legitimate advertising matter, seeking to get scholars for their particular institutions, through the mails broadcast to others than subscribers at 1 cent a pound. I will say no. Let me add that there is not a reputable college in this country, outside of those conducted for profit, that seeks or asks for this privilege.

Mr. TRACEY. The gentleman makes that statement rather too broad. I know of a reputable college, or rather a normal school, an institution of good character and standing—

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman is talking in his own time-not in

Mr. TRACEY. I merely wanted to state that I knew of such an institution that did ask this privilege.

Mr. LOUD. I will not deny that there are reputable institutions asking it. I said there were none such except those conducted for profit.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, the question has been raised in this discussion as to how the country press would be affected by the passage of this bill. My attention was directed to this question the other day when I read the editorial in the Kansas paper, to which the attention of the committee was called a short time ago by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads [Mr. Loud]. It occurred to me that the editor of that paper had altogether missed the mark; that instead of this bill militating altogether missed the mark; that instead of this bill militating against the interest of the country newspaper it will be an advantage to it to have the bill passed. We all know that throughout the country the average country newspaper has a struggle for existence. Under existing conditions most of these papers are not prosperous. Their circulation possibly does not average over 500 to a paper. Now, take one of these papers that we have been talking about. Take this paper called Comfort. I received a circular letter here this morning from it, and I presume every other member received a similar letter—

Mr. RICHARDSON. Under special-delivery stamp.

Mr. KYLE. Yes; under special-delivery stamp. At the head of this circular letter, which I presume is sent out over the country in order to induce people to subscribe for this publication, it is stated that the circulation is 1,250,000. Each issue of this paper presumably reaches 1,250,000 people. Now, what is this paper? It is simply an advertising sheet. How does it affect the country newspapers? Here is a paper which, as has been stated, has no legitimate list of subscribers, but which sends out 1,250,000 copies and depends upon its advertisements for subsistence. And this paper goes through the mails practically free. It is in fact an advertising sheet; and its advertising equals what might be contained in 2,500 of these local newspapers—I mean the weekly issues of 2,500 of these country presses. Now, I submit that if the Government is to go on in this way and encourage such newspapers as this—and I make no invidious distinction such newspapers as this—and I make no invidious distinction against this paper known as Comfort—I merely bring it before the House as an illustration of what I am trying to show—this paper called Comfort, by reason of the greater mail facilities afforded it, is enabled with its practically free circulation to reach 1,250,000 people weekly with its advertisements, thereby depriving the country newspaper of a considerable part of the legitimate advertising business that it ought to have. Instead of this bill being a strike at the country newspaper, I say that if carried out to its legitimate extent it would in my opinion operate in the interest of the country newspaper, not against it.

Now, when we get through with our side of this discussion, the gentlemen who are working might and main to prevent the passage gentlemen who are working might and main to prevent the pass of this bill continue to assert that the newspapers of the country are against the proposition, and they read isolated letters to sus-tain their position.

The CHAIRMAN. The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. KYLE. I thank the House. I shall not consume the whole of the five minutes, if I can avoid it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to a sheet which I have received, and have not had the time to read carefully. It came to me through the mails to-day, and no doubt to all gentlemen present, and I notice this statement is embodied in it:

The Loud bill has been approved in emphatic terms by every newspaper association which has taken action upon it, as witness the following: The Illinois State Press Association; the Agricultural Press League; the Associated Trade Press, composed of leading Western trade papers; the American Trade Press Association, composed of leading Eastern trade papers; the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, and others.

Now, sir, I hold in my hand a resolution adopted on yesterday by one of these press meetings, the Agricultural Press League, which includes the fifty leading agricultural papers of the United States, representing more than 70 per cent of the circulation of the legitimate agricultural papers in America. This phrase, "legitimate agricultural papers," is meant to describe those whose business is based upon subscription lists as against fake and sample-copy publications.

At a meeting held in the city of Washington on the 5th day of January, 1897, the following resolution was adopted by representatives of the American Trade Press Association, the Agricultural Press League, and the Agricultural Newspaper Publishers' Asso-

Resolved, That we earnestly urge the passage of House bill 4566, known as the Loud postal bill, which will correct the abuses that have grown up under the present law, and which are even more injurious to the newspapers than they are to the postal revenues.

Now, in the face of this, how is it possible for gentlemen to say that the newspapers of this country are opposed to the passage of this bill, and be candid? If they are opposed to its passage, they do not indicate that fact by their utterances. They do not indi-cate it, either, by the resolutions which they adopt. I wish to call your attention to another thing.

In reference to this paper Comfort, I never saw but one copy of In reference to this paper Comfort, I never saw but one copy of it in my life; but I want to call your attention as to how they designate it as a "sample copy." A good many of these papers will write the words "sample copy," or stamp them on the wrapper or on the face of the paper. But Comfort, in the issuance of its 1,250,000 copies that go every issue to the American people, has printed right across the face of the paper as it runs through the press "sample copy." And yet this paper weights the malls down with tons upon tons of matter. It comes in competition with the interests of the country press; it comes in competition with the interests of the country newspapers, and deprives them of adverthe interests of the country press; it comes in competition with the interests of the country newspapers, and deprives them of advertisements that they should be entitled to, and in this way the rural press is deprived of business which I think, some of it, at least, would go to them. So I repeat, that taking papers of the character of Comfort, the legitimate deduction from their publication is that the Government by this practically free postage to them is discriminating against the small country papers.

them is discriminating against the small country papers.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Of course, sir, a complete answer to all that has been said by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] is merely that it is in absolute defiance of existing law, and the Postmaster-General with the stroke of his pen can take the paper thus violating the law out of the mails, as he ought to do. If anything that the gentleman has said concerning Comfort is true, it is in violation of the law, and the Postmaster-Generalis implicated in that violation if he permits it to go on, and nothing that the pending bill proposes will stop such a violation of the law.

Now, I wish to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SIMPKINS], which I do not think was answered by the gentleman from California [Mr. Loud], and I want gentlemen who have the bill to take it up while I point I want gentlemen who have the bill to take it up while I point out to them exactly all the new legislation, not as to periodical books or sample copies, which the bill contains. I wish to be clearly understood in this statement. We have got here two great propositions embodied in this bill, to throw out books and to throw out sample copies. Now, setting them aside entirely, I want to point out the new legislation that is contained in the bill.

On page 2 of the bill, lines 13 and 14, you find the words: Or whether they purport to be premiums or supplements, or parts of reg-ular newspapers or periodicals.

That is to say, any book or reprint of a book, or part of a book or reprint of part of a book, which is issued by a newspaper—and your local county newspapers issue them all the time, every week—is cut out of the mails. Your local papers can no longer week—is cut out of the mails. Your local papers can no longer issue any book, whether it is a reprint or an original, in connection with their regular issues.

A Member. Why should not that be?

Mr. QUIGG. Because it is one of the best things they print, worth more than all the rest.

Now, the next new legislation is contained in lines 9, 10, 11, and

Provided, nevertheless. That news agents shall not be allowed to return to news agents or publishers at the pound rate unsold periodical publications, but shall pay postage on the same at the rate of I cent for 4 ounces.

That is the third-class rate. Now, that is new legislation. Every newspaper and every monthly magazine—the gentleman wanted to know how this bill was going to hit the monthly magazines, and I am telling him-every monthly magazine always has some one specially attractive feature on which it expects to sell that issue. Before the day of publication it sends out to every news dealer over the United States—and there are hundreds of thousands of them—information about this article. They say to thousands of them—information about this article. They say to the news dealer: "Unless you give orders to the contrary, we will increase your regular order for this number," 5, 10, 15, or 20, or as many copies as they think the dealer can stand. Under the law he can return the unsold copies at the pound rate. Now, suppose he sells 2 out of his 5, 7 out of his 10, 12 out of his 20, and so on. That means to that magazine a circulation of from 10,000 to 25,000 copies that it would not otherwise have. The news dealer can now return the rest at the pound rate. So that 10,000 to 25,000 copies that it would not otherwise have. The news dealer can now return the rest at the pound rate. So that, if you pass this law, you will hit every news dealer in the United States, and I have just filed a petition from about 10,000 of them. You will hit every Sunday news paper which makes this appeal to news dealers, and you will hit every magazine that is published.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman permit a simple question for information?

for information?

Mr. QUIGG. I should rather not, because I have only five minutes, and I want to point out the new legislation in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. QUIGG. I should like to have five minutes more.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. QUIGG. I will after I have pointed out the new legislation in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be ex-

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MAHANY. I reserve the right to object. If he will answer the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr.

moody] I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MAHANY. I object.

Mr. LOUD. I hope the gentleman will have the time he desires.

Mr. MOODY. I ask the gentleman not to object on my account.

Mr. MAHANY. I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his objection.

Is there further objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIGG. Now, on page 3, section 7, there is an unimportant addition to the law, in the words:

Which shall be shown by the publication itself.

That relates to its home office of publication, and is an excellent amendment.

On page 3, lines 15 and 16, appears what is to my mind the most absurd thing contained in the bill. These words are new legisla-

Who voluntarily orders and pays for the same

That is to say, added to the four statutory characteristics of a periodical publication in order that it may get into the mails—and this, you will understand, applies to county newspapers, city newspapers, daily, weekly, and monthly—it must establish to the satisfaction of the Postmaster-General that its subscription list is a voluntary one, that its subscribers have not been asked to subscribe, that they have done it of their own volition, and unless the Postmaster-General is satisfied that the publisher has not asked anyone to subscribe for his paper, but that the man has subscribed of his own volition, he can strike anything out of the mails that is printed. This is the kind of a bill you are asked to vote for.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. QUIGG. I want to go on and complete the statement of this new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. QUIGG. Now, the next new legislation is in lines 18 and 19, which adds the words:

Or any particular issue of any publication.

I do not see any particular fault with that. Now, lines 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25 make statute of a post-office regulation. Those lines are:

And provided. That all extra numbers of second-class publications sent by the publishers thereof, acting as the agent of an advertiser or purchaser, to addresses furnished by the latter, shall be subject to pay postage at the rate of 1 cent for every 4 ounces or fraction thereof.

That is a post-office regulation now, and I think a very good This makes statute law of that section 5, which is an amendment to the bill, and the same thing is true as to the four lines on the last page, which is now a post-office regulation, which this bill makes statute law. Now, section 5 is new legislation, and pro-vides in effect that every newspaper in the country that does a large business, although it does not say how large here, shall mainlarge business, although it does not say how large here, shall maintain within its own office a post-office, and shall separate all its matter, and shall do the work of post-office clerks before handing the mail into the office. Well, a great many of the great newspapers do that anyhow. All newspapers that have a very large circulation do that anyhow; but all the smaller newspapers of the country—the newspapers that circulate in the cities with a very small circulation—that is comparatively small—but send their publications out of the county, have to maintain a post-office in their office and separate all their matter. It means an addition of one or two clerks in every small newspaper office. Now, that is new legislation which this bill contains in addition to the sample-copy matter and the book matter. Now, if the gentleman from new legislation which this bill contains in addition to the samplecopy matter and the book matter. Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will ask me the question I will answer him.

Mr. MOODY. The question I desire to ask the gentleman from New York relates to the return privilege of unsold periodicals. I should like to ask the gentleman if the return privilege of unsold periodicals is not now confined to the news agents returning to their own agents?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes; it is.

Mr. MOODY. And the news agents can not return to the publisher?

Mr. QUIGG. Not directly. Mr. MOODY. Now, is not the practical effect of the continuation of that law to encourage the already great monopoly of the American News Company—

Mr. QUIGG. No.
Mr. MOODY (continuing). By compelling the small news dealer to deal with the American News Company, and thereby dealer to deal with the American News Company, and thereby gain the privilege of returning?

Mr. QUIGG. Oh, no; it is not a monopoly.

Mr. MOODY. I think it is.

Mr. QUIGG. If there is any part of the newspaper business I know, it is the part of the publisher. The American News Company is not a monopoly or anything of the kind.

Mr. MOODY. The gentleman knows. I supposed it was.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York has laid great stress on this return-copy privilege, in that it will circumscribe the circulation of great magazines. I have a letter in my possession, which I have not time to read, from a gentleman, in my possession, which I have not time to read, from a gentleman, Cyrus Curtis, proprietor of the Ladies' Home Journal, a man who has been in the publishing business for many years, and he says at the end of this letter: "I believe there are more unbusinesslike business men in the publishing business than any other business in the country." Now, then, this return privilege is simply used by these gentlemen to protect themselves against their agents, and that is all. If they wanted to exercise good business judgment, instead of lumbering the mails and sending back a lot of useless paper, they would have a page in their magazines or a portion of their paper that their agent, who should be a reputable man, should return to them, and they should accept that as evidence that he has not sold that copy, and the continuance of the present provision is simply to permit the United States Government to protect an agent against his agent.

Now, there is one other provision that the gentleman has laid great stress upon. That is that portion of the bill on page 3 that the gentleman takes exception to. I want to call his attention to it.

Mr. QUIGG. Lines 15 and 16. Mr. LOUD. The definition of a subscriber—

And must have a legitimate list of subscribers who voluntarily order and pay for the same.

Now, then, let me read from the present law, and I will show you it is a mere juggling with words which has been attempted and consummated from the very beginning until the present time. The present law—it is a regulation, but the gentleman will say that is not a statute, but it is just as binding as a statute law, and gives the Postmaster-General now supreme control of the regulations, and he defines a subscriber. I hope the House will

SECTION 281. Postmasters must require satisfactory evidence that publica-tions offered for mail at the pound rate have a legitimate list of subscribers, by each of whom, or for each of whom, with his consent, expressed or implied, payment of the subscription price has been made or agreed to be made.

Let the gentleman go to Webster and find out what "subscriber" is. It is a mere juggling with words—

Mr. QUIGG. You require him to pay in advance.

Mr. LOUD. I do not require him to pay in advance, and permit me to say emphatically it is a juggling with words. It is simply in this bill in a little better grammatical form than that. I am perfectly willing, Mr. Chairman, to accept the present law, as one means the same as the other.

Why, if the gentleman will go to Webster and find the definition of "subscriber," which he well knows, he would not attempt to delay the proceedings of this House by attempting to juggle with the word "subscriber." I ask any man in this House to read the present law and compare it with the bill, and he will find what a "subscriber" is—a man who agrees to a condition, agrees to pay 50 cents, $1, or $1.50, $2, or $2.50 a year, or so much a month, payable in advance, and the subscriber subscribes to that if he becomes one. Why, gentlemen, let me say to you again it is a juggling with words and has nothing whatever to do with the merits of this bill.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, if the words in lines 15 and merits of this bill.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, if the words in lines 15 and 16 mean anything in the world, they mean that the subscribers to newspapers shall be voluntary subscribers, and that they shall pay for their papers. Now, I have this to suggest in addition to what has been said by the gentleman from New York: Not only does the Postmaster-General have the power under this proposed law to decide who are and who are not voluntary subscribers, but in making his decisions he will almost invariably rely upon the information which he shall receive from local postmasters. There is hardly any other channel through which he can get the information, and certainly that would be the most convenient and the one upon which he would be most likely to depend. The bill, therefore, puts it in the power of a local postmaster who may have a grudge or a grievance against you or some whim in regard to you to rule your paper out of the mails if he shall see fit to do so. I regard this as one of the most unfortunate provisions of the bill. I think it clothes the Postmaster-General, in the first place, and the local postmasters, in the second place, with a power which and the local postmasters, in the second place, with a power which is dangerous to the people as well as contrary to the spirit of our institutions

My friend from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn], who is always forcible and eloquent, says that we who oppose this bill hide ourselves behind the periodicals. I wonder what the gentleman and his friends on the other side hide themselves behind? They select from all the books that are transmitted through the mails as second-class matter a few with picturesque titles and, I agree, with contents which none of us will approve, and they ask this House to strike out of the second-class mail matter all the books that now circulate in that second-class mail matter all the books that now circulate in that way simply on account of these few exceptions. Why, sir, the books to which these gentlemen have called attention are but a very small proportion of the whole. They are not even characteristic of the main body of the literature that circulates through the post-office as second-class matter. If they are objectionable, and I agree that they are, why has not the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, as I have already once said, reported a bill to exclude them entirely from the mails? That committee has had the subject under consideration and it has the power to report to exclude them entirely from the mails? That committee has had the subject under consideration, and it has the power to report such a measure, but this Loud bill does not exclude one of these reprehensible publications from the mails any more than it excludes a copy of Shakespeare or of Dickens or of Scott or of the Holy Bible. If they will report a kill to calcut the transfer of the Holy If they will report a bill to select the tares from the wheat and burn the tares, I will vote for it; but because there are a few tares in the wheat, these gentlemen want to set fire to the field and burn down all the wheat.

and burn down all the wheat.

Our friends on the other side have attempted to show also that there are certain publishers in this country who favor this bill. But who are they? The Harpers and some other large publishers. Ah, Mr. Chairman, those great publishers know that they are not to be injured by the passage of this bill. If they believed they were to be injured as others are to be, you would find them on the other side. They have a motive in taking the position which they do take with regard to this legislation. While they are not to be injured, they see that this bill, if it shall become law, will ruin certain others who are now their competitors.

ruin certain others who are now their competitors.

I wonder whether the Harpers do not want to drive out of existence the Youth's Companion and McClure's and Munsey's magazines? In these matters publishers are as selfish as men are everywhere in the world. Who believes that the great publishers who favor this legislation are governed by patriotism when they come in here and ask to have certain publications other than their own excluded from the mails? I do not. No one does.

Mr. HEPBURN. I was about to ask my friend from Maine in what way would the passage of this bill enable rival publishers like the Harpers to get rid of McClures or of the Youth's Companion. Neither one of those publications will, I undertake to say, be affected by the passage of this bill, and, so far as I know, neither one of those publications has sought the aid of the gentleman from Maine or of any other gentleman to oppose the passage of this measure.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Possibly they would have done so if I had been as distinguished as my friend from Iowa. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Now, Mr. Chairman, while I am talking to the gentleman from Maine, I want to refer to an enterprise in his own town, the publication known as Comfort.

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is not in my town.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understood the gentleman to say it was.

That is not in my town. I understood the gentleman to say it was. The gentleman misunderstood me. Mr. MILLIKEN.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman said that the city of Augusta had sent more brains to this and to the other House of Congress than any other city of 10,000 inhabitants in this country. I know the gentleman's accuracy and truthfulness, but I knew also that that statement could not be true unless he was a resident of that city. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman from Iowa is always compli-

Mr. MILLIKEN. The gentleman from Iowa is always complimentary, but I spoke of Augusta, and I do not live within 40 miles of that city, and therefore I did not refer to myself, but I have no doubt the gentleman would have done so for me if he had been making the speech. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I would. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG], it seems to me, made some serious blunders in the argument he sought to present yesterday, to the effect that by permitting these publications to go through the mails at the 1 cent a pound rate the Government received full compensation through the swelling of the other classes of mail matter incidental to such publications. To quote the gentleman accurately, he said, speaking of a publisher in Augusta, Me.:

He pays $2.000 a month to the Government to take his newspaper and spread

He pays $2,000 a month to the Government to take his newspaper and spread it broadcast. He pays $6,000 to the Government for the stamps with which he conducts his correspondence with his patrons. He pays $2,000 more a month for third and fourth class postage.

By the way, I am admonished by one of the circulars of this concern that this class of business is done, not in Boston, but in Augusta, for I read:

Send bills and remittances to the home office, Augusta, Me.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that statement was intended to mean that Now, Mr. Chairman, that statement was intended to mean that $10,000 a month, or $120,000 a year, was paid by this concern to the postal revenues of the United States.

Mr. QUIGG. Yes; and I have no doubt of it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yet there are other concerns in that city—two, at least, I am told—one larger and one nearly as large as this; and yet the total postal receipts of the city of Augusta for the last fixed year were but $50,000 this; and yet the total postal receipts of the city of Augusta for the last fiscal year were but $89,000.

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman did not understand me. Will he let me interrupt him a moment?

Mr. MILLIKEN. Let me say—

Mr. HEPBURN. I will not yield to the gentlemen now.

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman does not understand—

Mr. HEPBURN. I think I understand what the gentlemen said. I think I understood what the House understood from the declarations they made. I am satisfied that there was an error.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I can explain the matter to the gentleman, if he will allow me a word.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I can explain the matter to the gentleman, if he will allow me a word.

Mr. HEPBURN. But, Mr. Chairman, let us admit for the sake of argument that $2,000 monthly is paid. What does that mean? It means that 200,000 pounds of that class of mail matter is sent out of that city each month. That means 100 tons each month. That means, when postal cars are loaded, 10 cars each month. These gentlemen say that their circulation extends all over the United States. From San Francisco to Augusta is 3,500 miles. Let us take the mean and assume that that is the average distance.

Let us take the mean and assume that that is the average distance traversed by this matter—1,750 miles. On the basis of this estimate they have car service for 1,750 miles for $200. Is that right? If any one of you gentlemen seek a like car service—not in a postal car, but in the commonest freight car-you must pay largely in excess of this.

excess of this.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago I asked a question of the gentleman from New York, and I received a reply to it. The question related to the publication of newspapers, and for the time being I yielded to the authority of the gentleman from New York. Since I took my seat, a letter has been handed me addressed to some other member of the House than myself, and signed by a gentleman whose authority I know the gentleman from New York will recognize as superior even to his own—the business manager of one of the largest Republican newspapers in the city of New York—a paper which on the whole, I believe, is opposed to this bill. This letter contains the following language, which I commend to the attention of the House, because I conceive that when the section referred to, relating to the return privilege, is reached, an attempt will be made to strike it out:

How it ever came about that the postal laws gave news dealers the right to return unsold copies to their news companies, but not to the publishers of the papers, I never knew. But the effect of the regulation is to throw the sale and distribution of dailies into the hands of one powerful news company, which, with its branches, covers the whole United States. This is not right, and the law should be changed.

Now, I submit that the thought which was behind my question, and which was contradicted by the gentleman from New York, is true; that if we retain the return privilege in its present form, we are contributing to the overflowing coffers of the American News Company. I trust, therefore, that if the provision in section 3 relating to the return privilege is stricken out of this bill, it will be accompanied by an amendment which will extend the present privilege of return, so that returns may be made at the cheaper rate, not only to news agents, but to publishers of newspapers and magazines. While I am on the floor, allow me to say one or two words more, and then I am of the floor, allow he to say one of two words hole, and then I am done. I received, as my colleague [Mr. Simpkins] and many other members of the House have received, a printed protest from many of the papers in my own district—a protest which at first I felt bound to heed. But having followed this debate from the beginning, I now believe that the country news-papers are being made cats'-paws in this matter to take out of the fire the chestnuts of these great publication companies, extending from Augusta City to New York. I believe that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] struck the true note in his argument a short time ago when he told us that the real interest of the country newspapers was to strike down such competition as reaches them from the city of Augusta—a competition which cuts down their advertising income and their circulation. I propose, in spite of the protest that I have received, believing that I am voting for the true interest of the country newspapers, to vote for this bill. [Applause.

[Applause.]
Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, in my remarks yesterday upon this bill I referred to an affidavit that had been filed with the Post-Office Department. I could not at the time find that affidavit, and it was omitted from my remarks as published. I have since found it attached to the publication referred to and I propose to read it. This is a copy handed to me by the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, the original being on file in his office.

NEW YORK, December 30, 1896.

office:

New York, December 30, 1896.

To the Assistant Postmaster,
New York City.

Dear Sir: Since my short interview with you on the 28th, I have decided to give you the facts in detail regarding Cheerful Moments.

In the latter part of April of the present year I purchased Cheerful Moments from the Cheerful Moments Publishing Company, a corporation existing under the laws of the State of New York.

Immediately thereafter, by an understanding had previous to my purchasing the paper, I transferred one-third interest to H. H. Hull, and one-third interest to — Bailey. This latter one-third interest was in fact the property of Charles E. Balley, but to deceive the Post-Office Department he had his interest made to his brother, whose initials I have forgotten, and who resides in New Mexico; but at all times Charles E. Balley owned the third interest, which was in the name of his brother, a fact which can be substantiated by more than a dozen business firms, and also by placing H. H. Hull on his oath.

Under our management the first issue of the paper was mailed in May, 1896. To us was turned over subscription books containing about 70,000 names, but by the advice of Mr. C. E. Bailey, and by his orders, only those who were paid in advance were continued as subscribers. There were about 7,000 names on the books who were paid in advance and to whom the paper was sent, all others being dropped but not erased from the books. A lady by the name of Miss Judge, yet in the employ of Cheerful Moments, copied the names from the subscription books for May. Afterwards Miss Judge and a Miss Cleaver copied names from subscription books, sending only to those who were paid in advance, but never erasing any names, but keeping the books as they were with 70,000 names to submit to post-office inspectors if called upon to do so.

From 100,000 to 105,000 copies of the paper were mailed in single wrappers each month, as will be seen by the sworn statement of C. E. Bailey and H. H. Hull. Being in the letter business (buying and renting mailed apparently to subscribers and 32,000 copies were marked "sample copies."

From the start under our management the paper was run in the interest of the Cooperative Advertising Company, a "fake" concern owned by C. E. Bailey. To this I protosted, but Mr. Hull siding with Mr. Bailey, I could not force my objections, and every issue of the paper was largely devoted to Mr. Bailey's cooperative advertising scheme, as will be seen if the files of the paper are consulted from May, 1896, to December, 1896.

From the fact that the paper was run in Bailey's interest, I sold my interest in July to H. H. Hull, but continued with the paper up to about December 8, 1896.

About six weeks ago C. E. Bailey claimed to have sold his interest in the paper to a Mr. Willis, and the management was turned over to Mr. Willis, However, Mr. Bailey and Mr. Hull continued to receive all money and pay all bills, and the transfer of Bailey's interest is doubted by all conversant with the business.

I think it was in July that a contract was made with the Erie Medical Company, of Buffalo, N. Y., by which the Erie Medical Company purchased a half page, and in consideration of said half page they were to have the exclusive right to advertisements of their class, "general debility." At once all advertising of that nature was taken out of the paper and the half page for the Erie Medical Company inserted. In addition to this space, the Erie Medical Company was to have certain numbers of the paper sent to their customers or prospective customers, names to be furnished by the Erie Medical Company. For the August issue, 1896, the Erie Medical Company furnished addressed wrappers and the paper was mailed to 60,000 of their prospective patrons. For this half-page advertisement and other privileges the Erie Medical Company pays $225 per month. The facts as stated above can be substantiated by Mr. Courtney, manager of the Erie Medical Company, of Buffalo, N. Y.

There are now only about 4,000 names on the subscription books who are subscribers, and to whom the paper has been sent since under the present management.

management.
Should this statement be denied in any particular, I trust you will give me the opportunity to meet these gentlemen, with the representative of the Department.

Very truly, yours,

P. F. HIGKS

R. E. HICKS.

Sworn to before me this 30th day of December, 1896.

E. S. POST, Notary Public, New York County.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, when this question was before our committee I did not see how there could be any opposition on the floor to this bill; and some of us not so well informed as the Postmaster-General and the chairman of our committee thought it master-General and the chairman of our committee thought it would be much better for us to take even more advanced steps in the direction in which this bill goes. When we had piled up before us periodicals like this which I hold in my hand, which I would not insult the ears of my colleagues on this committee by reading aloud, so indecent are they—when I found that matter such as this is registered as second-class mail matter and passes through the mails as a fraud—a shame to the circulating libraries of this country—I did not conceive how any man could get up on the floor of this House and oppose a measure of this kind.

But gentlemen come here opposing this measure indorsed, as the floor of this House and oppose a measure of this kind.

But gentlemen come here opposing this measure indorsed, as they say, by the great newspapers of the country—the country newspapers, the agricultural papers, etc. Are not the newspapers themselves the best guardians of the newspapers and their interests? They have spoken with almost a unanimous voice—90 per cent of them at least—in favor of this measure.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I challenge the gentleman's statement. They have not; and I defy him to prove it.

Mr. HALL. I have taken the statement of the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads with regard to the 90 per cent. I believe it to be absolutely correct. I will take that statement and the investigations on which it is based as being accurate—

Mr. CUMMINGS (interrupting). You have 182 newspapers out of 1,865 daily newspapers printed in the United States. That

Mr. HALL. I repeat, I have simply used the statement printed in the published report of the committee, and prepared by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I am perfectly willing to rest the case on that statement without taking up further time.

Let us refer to the statement of the gentleman from Iowa, or Let us refer to the statement of the gentleman from Iowa, or rather the answer to it by the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG], in which the gentleman from New York makes the statement that the paper Comfort pays, he believes, to the Post-Office Department as high as $125,000 a year toward the revenues of the Government. In response to that statement, I wish to present the official, authentic record of the facts, which goes to show that the Government pays out $$50,624 more than it gets back for its work in circulating this paper. And that comes from the district of my friend from Maine who now seeks to interrupt me; but I can not yield to him.

The question is squarely before the committee and it seems a square and open case. There can be no doubt as to the point at issue. The Post-Office Department, through its Postmasters-General, has ruled so long in favor of letting this matter in that it has become a regulation as binding as law in the Department. Will you continue it? Will you continue to run the Government $8,000,000 behind every year in the transportation of this class of mail matter? Will you allow this class of mail matter to go through the mails at the same low rate it has heretofore enjoyed—matter that you would not allow to come into your house, and matter that you would not allow to come into your house, and you would kick a man out of your house if he attempted to bring it in?

it in?

Now, sir, a number of suggestions have been made to the Post-Office Department in regard to extending the privileges—I mean extending them to the people of the United States in the rural districts. A movement has been made, and proved effective, for the purpose of providing rural free delivery throughout the whole country. It has been said that we could try it, but that the bar is forever closed against such privileges to the rural communities as long as there is a deficit of $8,000,000 a year in the revenues of the Department, caused by these nefarious and infamous publications being allowed to go through the mails at this low rate.

deficit which exists in the Department, and at the same time place ourselves in a position for extending the privileges of the Post-Office Department to all classes of our people, by barring out from the mails the infamous specimens of literature—the secondclass matter—to which I have referred?

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the question is plain, and one that has scarcely two sides. For that reason I must confess I was surprised this morning on returning to the House and examining the official Record to find that there was serious objection to the bill when it was proposed by the committee unani-mously, after a thorough investigation of all of the reports of Postmasters-General for years past, and recommended by the entire seventeen members of the committee without dissent.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I have no interest either for or against those who claim the benefits of this bill other than that which is common to the whole country.

I think one thing will turn the vote of the House on this question, and that is, How will it affect the country newspapers? I represent a district distinguished in many ways, but not for great newspapers. They would all be classed as "country newspapers" by the representatives of the great cities, and I therefore have scrutinized the bill to see how it would affect them. I can not see that there is a single provision in the bill that would deny the country newspaper every privilege it enjoys under existing law.

The bill provides that every newspaper claiming matter entitled to pass through the mails as second class shall have a legitimate subto pass through the malls assecond class shall have a legitimate subscription list of subscribers who voluntarily pay their subscriptions. But I submit there is no provision in the bill which provides that a newspaper which has a legitimate subscription list may not send a copy of the paper anywhere throughout the country. There is nothing to prevent a newspaper which has a bona fide subscription list from enjoying every privilege that it is now entitled to enjoy. The only question is whether there ought not to be a limit on a paper; that a paper should have a bona fide subscription list of at least nine-tenths of its circulation; and if it has such a list at all it can send out anywhere copies to newspapers under the exchange system just as they do now. There is nothing to prevent them from soliciting subscribers.

Mr. Chairman, if a boy 10 years old had told me that under this Mr. Chairman, if a boy 10 years old had told me that under this bill a newspaper could not solicit subscriptions, I should have thought him below the average in intelligence. But when a distinguished member of this House, representing a great city district, rises and says the bill would prevent the proprietor of a newspaper from soliciting subscriptions, I must say I am astonished that the claim can possibly be made. There is nothing to deprive the country newspaper of any right. The petitions forwarded here are petitions prepared by the offices which send out second-class mail matter by tons and hundreds of tons, and who get the country editors and newspapers to sign the petitions and send them here, not knowing what provisions are embodied in the bill, I shall vote against the amendment, and will vote for the bill, believing that we should rise high enough to defend our country believing that we should rise high enough to defend our country against the clamor of the people who are demanding that they shall be benefited especially by virtue of the postal laws.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to ask a question for information, which I think the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE], a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, owing to his long service in the House, can answer.

I wish to ask what effect the bill will have, if any, upon exchanges between newspapers as now carried on under existing

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that there is nothing in the bill that would militate against the exchanges between newspapers as the right now exists. This bill provides for such newspapers as are paid for by the subscribers, and when one newspaper publisher exchanges his paper for another paper, it is payment for that paper, is it not? Can it be anything else? Can any other reasonable construction be put upon the proposition?

If I buy a bushel of corn from one of you gentlemen and pay for it with a bushel of wheat, it is payment, is it not? If one newspaper publisher sends his paper to another, and that pub-lisher, in payment for that paper, sends an exchange back to him, lisher, in payment for that paper, sends an exchange back to him, it is payment, is it not?

Consequently there can be nothing in the objection that is being raised against this bill here, that it would cut off the exchanges of the country. It seems absurd to claim that such a condition as that could possibly arise out of this bill, to say that it would cut off the exchanges between newspapers, simply because it requires that there shall be a legitimate subscription, and that these newspapers shall be paid for. I trust that I have replied to the question of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I think our friends on the other side are not very complimentary to the country newspapers.

mous publications being allowed to go through the mails at this low rate.

Now, how can we offset that deficit and give to our people the benefits of the service which they require? Will we abolish the the gentleman thinks that he understands better than they do the gentleman thinks that he understands better than they do that the country newspapers would be benefited by this bill, because the great publications which now go through the mails as second-class matter compete with them and injure them.

Now, it is not true that these publications compete with the country newspaper. They are a different class of publications entirely. The country newspaper, as a rule, gives the local news, and it is most valuable to the people in the locality and the people who have gone away from the locality. And the strongest country newspaper, and the one that is best sustained, is the one that does give the local news. The publication of these periodicals does not compete with them in any degree at all.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MILLIKEN. In a moment.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. WILSON] says that the publishers of these papers have signed petitions that have come here, having been solicited to do so by the friends of these great publications, and being like the Jews when they crucified their Saviour, not knowing what they do. I should like to know by what authority my friend, for whom I have great personal respect, declares to this House that the country newspaper editors do not know what they do when they sign petitions. My acquaintance with them assures me that they are as intelligent a class of people as any in this country. Perhaps they would compare favorably with the membership of this House, and I think it is an unwarranted assumption on the part of my friend from Missouri [Mr. Hall.] that they sign petitions because they are oversolicited to do so, not they sign petitions because they are oversolicited to do so. sumption on the part of my friend from Missouri [Mr. HALL] that they sign petitions because they are oversolicited to do so, not they sign petitions because they are oversolicited to do so, not knowing what they do.

One thing more. My friend from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn] made a statement as to the amount of postal receipts at the Augusta post-office. Let me tell him that the postal receipts to which he refers are shown by the number of stamps purchased at the Augusta office. But these great publications in Augusta receive a considerable part of their pay in postage stamps, which they use on mail matter that requires stamps, and these stamps are not accounted to the Augusta office. And while the report may show that the office pays only perhaps $90.000 a year, yet I think the accounted to the Augusta office. And while the report may show that the office pays only perhaps $90,000 a year, yet I think the Department knows that the office really paid from $150,000 to $200,000. That is to say, stamps to that amount go through the office, though not bought at the office. The gentleman knows that if he receives a dollar's worth of postage stamps in payment for something he has sent out, when he puts those stamps on his letters they are not accounted to the office where he mails the letters.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I look upon this bill as one perhaps not framed for the purpose, but which will have the result certainly of smashing certain great industries in this country, at a time when we can little afford to have it done. It will not only injure the great publishing houses, but it will injure the paper manufac-turers, the pulp mills, the lumber interests, and the railroads. It will relegate many workingmen to idleness when we already have too many forced out of employment.

I do not believe that the effect of the bill will be to save one penny to this Government. As I have said before to-day, I believe that the loss in the postal revenues if this bill shall become a law will be more than equal to any reduction in expenses on second-class mail matter.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the bill, and shall vote against it. I believe it will be a great injury to legitimate industries in this country and will do no good.

I see that my friend from Missouri [Mr. Hall] on the Post-Office Committee calls certain publications which have been mentioned. here nefarious and infamous. I repeat again, what I said before: Why, in the name of Heaven, if they are nefarious and infamous, did not this Committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads report to this House a bill to exclude them from the mails? His committee has not done that. It gives no remedy in that direction. Let us defeat this bill, so drastic and sweeping as to do immense mischief. Then, if there be abuses, let the committee report a bill which shall cure them without bringing disaster to legitimate business and destroying great investments made under and encouraged by the present law

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman—
Mr. TERRY. A parliamentary inquiry. Idesire to be advised as to the present status of amendments. I understood this bill was being read by sections in order that amendments might be offered?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the first section has been read and one amendment adopted. This debate has been proceeding on an amendment to strike out the last word.

Mr. TERRY. There is no amendment pending, then?

The CHAIRMAN. No amendment is pending.

Mr. TERRY. I hope we will have the remainder of the bill read.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Would it not be possible for the debate in some way to be closed, so that amendments might be offered to the second clause?

A motion might be made to close debate. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have been recog-The CHAIRMAN. Mr. CUMMINGS. nized.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Every word that I said yesterday, Mr. Chairman, concerning the effect of the passage of this bill upon the country newspaper is true. That paper will be injured in more ways than one; and if any gentleman desires to know how, he can read the remarks I made yesterday and ascertain. [Laughter.]

I wish now to address myself to another feature of the bill. I received this telegram ten minutes ago:

Mr. MOODY. None of them in my district. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. None of them in your district! Have you no State pride? Has the State pride of Massachusetts left your breast entirely? Most wonderful anomaly! The manufacturers of Massachusetts are compelled to telegraph to a Democratic breast entirely? Most wonderful anomaly! The manufacturers of Massachusetts are compelled to telegraph to a Democratic Representative from New York City to represent their interests on this floor in antagonism to an attack from their own Representatives! [Great laughter and applause.]

No, sir: this thing not only strikes at the country newspapers of this Union, but it strikes at every book publishing company here as well. This House ought to look to it. While you are feeding country "killies" to great newspaper sharks, you ought at least to have some regard for the great publishing interests which are intimately allied to the interests of States which you represent. Mr. Chairman, as a New York Democrat, I am proud to be called upon by these gentlemen from Boston and from other cities in intelby these gentlemen from Boston and from other cities in intellectual Massachusetts to protest against the work of one of their Representatives here in Congress. [Laughter.] I do so with great pleasure, indeed, and thank them for giving me the opportunity. [Renewed laughter and applause.]

Here the hammer fell.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman—
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. MAHANY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat laid great stress in his speech of yesterday upon the fact that his contention was supported by the influence of the New York Tribune and the New York Herald. the influence of the New York Tribune and the New York Herald. Over against that argument I set the New York Commercial Advertiser, the New York Evening Post, the New York Journal, the New York Mail and Express, the New York Press, of which the leader on the other side of this debate [Mr. QUIGG] was late the editor, the New York Sun, and the New York Times. The gentleman from New York in his speech of yesterday also said that the agricultural papers were opposed to the Loud bill, but I find that the Agricultural Press League, composed of a vast number of the more important agricultural papers in the country, has heartily approved and indorsed it.

heartily approved and indorsed it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I beg your pardon. The gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me?

Mr. MAHANY. I certainly do not.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I quoted an agricultural paper that protested against the bill. I quoted no others.

Mr. MAHANY. Well, even so, this is the Agricultural Press League advocating the bill as against the only agricultural paper which you instanced in opposition.

Mr. CUMMINGS. They have not had time to put in their protests. They will inundate you with protests if you give them time.

Mr. MAHANY. Your "boiler-plate" literary bureau seems to have syndicated the "protest" business.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. They had two weeks' time at

Mr. MAHANY. Yes; as my friend suggests, they had two weeks at Christmas, with full knowledge that this bill was to come up after the recess.

I hold in my hand a letter addressed to another member of this House, the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, from the head of the great publishing house which issues the Ladies' Home Journal, concededly a paper having one of the largest circulations enjoyed by any publication in the world. The writer, addressing the chairman of the committee,

PHILADELPHIA, March 10, 1896

MY DEAR SIR: The inclosed circulars, i. e., in opposition to the Loud bill, came to me by mail to-day, and as they concern your bill, permit me to say that this committee of New York publishers whose names are appended to the circular I never before heard of, although I have been in the publishing business for many years. I am familiar with the New York publishing world, and as these names are strangers to me, I can not but feel that they are not important factors in the publishing business.

I wish to write to you that I believe it to be the honest opinion of most reputable publishers that your bill will be a benefit to the trade. It will increase my expenses somewhat on returns from news agents, but will result in their being more careful in ordering supplies for actual needs instead of haphazard.

result in their being more careful in ordering supplies for actual needs instead of haphazard.

I believe it will be a good thing to exclude sample copies from the mails at present pound rates, for the reason that the reception of sample copies is generally considered a nuisance. And furthermore, I am of the opinion that there is a great deal of fraud in this sample-copy business toward advertisers. Large circulations are claimed on the basis of number of copies printed and sent out at this cheap rate, and, as a rule, a newspaper or periodical that has not been ordered or paid for carries little weight with the recipient, and therefore has but little influence and little value to reputable advertisers. Yours, truly,

CYRUS CURTIS.

Mr. Chairman, I led the fight against the Loud bill in the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads (of which I am a member), and I desire to say now that after a very careful investigation consideration of all the various conflicting facts and arguments presented I came to the conclusion that on a last analysis there was absolutely no argument against this bill, and certainly none in favor of mulcting the United States Government from eighteen to twenty millions of dollars annually for the benefit of a few selfish and monopolistic corporations engaged in the publishing business.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy the attention

My friend from New of the committee for only a few minutes. My friend from New of the committee for only a few minutes. My friend from New York [Mr. Cummings] a moment ago gave me a prominence in this discussion which I do not deserve. Until this morning I had not made up my mind which way I should vote in the committee upon this bill. I had the pleasure (and it is always a pleasure and a profit) of reading the gentleman's speech in the RECORD this morning, because I was detained from the House when it was made yesterday, but I confess I did not get as much light as I did amusement. [Laughter.] The principal thing that I saw in the speech was that the gentleman from New York took occasion to say to the bicyclists of this country, and especially of his own say to the bicyclists of this country, and especially of his own district, that he would vote for good roads in every State of the Union if the Federal Government had the power to give them, and

Now, sir, because I saw fit to reply to the gentleman from New York somewhat facetiously, and perhaps a little out of taste, by saying that none of the persons whose names he read resided and my district, the gentleman opened the vials of his wrath and poured them down upon my devoted head and accused me of lacking proper State pride.

Mr. Chairman, I have some State pride. I have some desire to represent the State of Massachusetts as well as the district within which I live, and I believe that I can best represent my district and best represent my State and speak its truest voice, not by and best represent my State and speak its truest voice, not by considering the selfish interests of any one industry, but by considering the interests of the whole people of Massachusetts [applause], and by considering further than that—and I hope it will always be in my mind—the interests of the whole people of the American Union. [Applause.] I believe this bill is in the interest of the people and against the interest of the few, which has been nourished under the present law. I say again, that for that reason, in spite of the interests that may be marshaled against it in Massachusetts, in spite of the interests that there may be against it even in my own district, believing it to be for the interest of the whole people, I propose to vote for the passage of this bill. [Applause.] [Applause.] Mr. BLUE.

Mr. BLUE. Mr. Chairman, it is conceded on all hands that abuses exist that this bill is intended to correct. It is agreed, at least by a large portion of this body, that the provision in regard to second-class matter which is now existing law causes annually a deficit. The meritorious features of this measure are assailed by some on the ground that other abuses exist which the bill does by some on the ground that other abuses exist which the birdoes not seek to correct. If that argument is to prevail, then no reform can ever be enacted. Every effort that is made at reform is but a partial effort. If that contention is to succeed, then every bill that is introduced to correct any abuse can be defeated upon the same ground. Great stress has been laid upon the assertion that this bill interferes with the country newspapers.

A correful even in a time to the measure will show that that is not

A careful examination of the measure will show that that is not true. It is an extremely suspicious circumstance, also, that the petitions which come here from the country press in opposition to this bill seem to be printed upon the same character of paper, tinted precisely alike in all cases, and bearing the impress of having been prepared by some central agency interested in defeating this measure. Who antagonizes it? Chiefly the manufacturers of paper. Are they not already sufficiently protected in the tariff laws of this country? If they are not, they will be, I apprehend, when the next tariff bill passes. Let us not seek to use the Treasury of the United States to protect these interests.

Let us look at this bill as it is presented here, and consider and dispose of it upon its merits. It is also urged that this bill should be defeated because it seeks to exclude from the mails copies of books which are of a high literary character, which are published books which are of a high literary character, which are published in the supplements and sample copies of newspapers. Under the shelter and protection of a few chapters of such books, tomes of advertisements and vicious literature are distributed broadcast over the country, corrupting the morals and debasing the sentiments of the people at the expense of the Government.

The argument made here that the word "voluntarily," as used in the bill, would exclude a newspaper that seeks subscriptions is anyworthy of the gentlemen who make it. If their position he unworthy of the gentlemen who make it. If their position be correct, then every man who is asked to subscribe to a newspaper, and who in fact does subscribe, is coerced to that extent. Such an argument is mere sophistry; there is no merit in it.

This measure, Mr. Chairman, should become a law. In my judgment it will save the Treasury of the United States from ten to fifteen million dollars annually. To permit the law to continue as it now stands is to give to the paper manufacturers and the advertising agencies of this country a bounty to that extent to carry on their business at the expense of the Government. I am in favor of the bill. I shall vote for it as it stands, and I trust that it will become a law.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 4 o'clock having arrived, the Committee of the Whole will rise and report the bill to the House. The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4566) to amend the postal laws relating to received class real investment of the order. second-class mail matter; and he now, in pursuance of the order of the House, reported the bill back with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole and with the amendments which were pending.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were read and agreed to, as follows:

In line 6 of section 1 strike out after the word "three" the word "and," and insert "or;" so as to read: "Within the conditions named in sections 3 or 4 of this act."

After the word "special," in line 14 of section 4, strike out "interest" and insert "industry."

Insert the following as a new section:
"Sec. 5. That publishers and others whose publications shall be admitted as mail matter of the second class under the provisions of this act shall be required, before depositing such mail matter in the post-office, to separate the same into United States mail sacks or bundles by States, cities, towns, and counties, as the Postmaster-General may direct."

Change the numbering of sections 5 and 6 to 6 and 7.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The question being put,
The SPEAKER. The Chair is in doubt.
Mr. QUIGG. I call for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and there were—yeas 144, nays 104, not voting 108; as follows:

THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD DEBT-CALIFORNIA'S REMONSTRANCE AGAINST REFUNDING IT.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

Gentlemen: In again appearing in opposition to the passage by Congress of a measure for refunding or extending time on the dobt of the Central Pacific Company, we beg to call to your recollection the many objections expressed in our memorial on behalf of the people of this State presented to the last session of Congress as well as to the following additional facts and considerations, some of which have been developed since that memorial was presented and others have been suggested by the course the discussion of the proposal has taken.

REVERSAL OF ESTABLISHED CONGRESSIONAL POLICY AS TO PACIFIC ROADS

sented and others have been suggested by the course the discussion of the proposal has taken.

REVERSAL OF ESTABLISHED CONGRESSIONAL POLICY AS TO PACIFIC ROADS.

I. In granting aid to the Texas Pacific road, and to the Southern Pacific Railroad, it was undoubtedly the intention of Congress to create a southern route across the continent which would constitute a rival to the central route on that side, as the Northern Pacific road was designed to do on the north. The purpose was to give to the people of the whole country the advantage of competition in overland transportation. Without accurate knowledge of the extent to which extortion in charges was practiced on the Central line (since brought to light by the Pacific Railroad Commission), it was common knowledge that the charges were excessively high, and the creation and maintenance of competing roads were recognized as necessary. Therefore, to insure their construction and maintenance, ald was liberally granted by Congress. Independent of its enormous subvention in bonds, the Central Pacific Company received as a donation of land aggregating, after all deductions, 8,000,000 acres, worth at minimum Government price $20,000,000, but estimated at more by themselves, their sales, down to December 31, 1882, having produced an average price of $4.85 per acre. (Vid. report of December 31, 1882, having produced an average price of $4.85 per acre. (Vid. report of December 31, 1882, apace $57, 59). The Southern Pacific land grant in California amounted to 10, 445, 227 acres, worth at minimum Government price $20,113, 175, but of which their own report of December 31, 1882, says: "A very large portion of them is choice agricultural and timber land, and will command a much higher price." In fact, the subsequent table in same report shows the average price so far to have been $4.38 per acre. (Annual report December 31, 1882, pages 48, 44, 51.)

This beneficent and well-considered policy of Congress in pursuit of which it has so bountifully endowed these two companies has

PALSE PRETENSES TO CONGRESS-CONCEALMENT OF MATERIAL FACTS

II. The indulgence and extension of time here involved are asked under false pretenses the disengenuousness of which should forbid entertaining the proposal. The demand for time to pay is based on the suggestion of poverty on the part of the debtor, whose earning power, it is said, can not reach beyond the pittance proposed to be required by the pending bill, but the pretense of poverty is entirely false. The Central Pacific Railroad Company is paying dividends to its shareholders to-day, with promise to double them as soon as the bill passes, and it has very large means, money claims, which should be called in and applied to the payment of its debts. Some of these are as follows:

I. Claims against its former directors and managers, amounting to many are as follows:

I. Claims against its former directors and managers, amounting to many millions, for misappropriation of its funds and property by means of fraudulent contracts and dealings with themselves through the disguise of construction companies—the Contract and Finance Company, the Western Development Company, etc.

II. Claims of great magnitude against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, its successful rival in business, to be explained below.

III. Claims against its directors for fraudulent mismanagement, whereby its revenues have been impaired for their own benefit.

Of these claims in their order. The proof of the dividends paid, afterwards.

of these canns in their cuter to prove the provided and specific Railroad Commission shows that the assets and resources of the Central Pacific Railroad Commission shows that the assets and resources of the Central Pacific Railroad Company were diverted and appropriated to their own private gain and in fraud of the company by the original directors, Huntington, Stanford, Crocker, and Hopkins, through the instrumentality of construction companies, and gives approximately the amount stolen. These proceedings are now in their outline familiar to all well-informed persons, and altogether the frauds practiced in the construction of the Pacific railroads are generally regarded as the most disgraceful public scandal in the annals of the country. No public man has ever dared to defend them, though several were shown to have profited by them and were relegated by public opinion to merited obscurity; they have never received even tacit condonation from Congress, and to pardon them now, by extending the time for payment, as if the liability were an ordinary debt, would be to affirm by act of Congress that in the judgment of that body the acts in question came up to the standard of morals properly applicable to the disbursement of public funds intrusted, in a moment of great public peril, to the honor of private citizens. Better by far lose the whole amount of the debt than affirm such doctrine. But the debt need not be lost; every dollar of profit gained by these dishonest directors can be yet recovered by the company or by a receiver appointed in a foreclosure representing the interests of creditors and stockholders. The company has never brought such suit because its management has ever been controlled by the perpetrators of the frauds or those deriving from them. Individual stockholders have from time to time sued on behalf of the corporation, but, though vigorously defended, not one of them has been allowed to proceed to judgment. They have all been compromised for amounts and on terms which implicitly admit guilt. "The allegations," says the friendly majority of the Pacific Railroad Commission in their report (page 75), "contained in these complaints were such as would compel men of honor, if these allegations were false, to defend themselves at any cost. It appears from the evidence that all these suits were settled, and that the stocks owned by the plaintiffs were bought at rates varying from $400 a share to $1.000 a share." None of these settlements, however, condone the wrongs done the company, and no statute of limitation has barred its right. That right is an asset of great value, for the responsibility of Mr. Huntington individually and of the Crocker estate are undoubted. The latter has been, fortunately, kept undivided by transfer to a corporation composed of the heirs, and is distinctly recognizable in present hands.

THE CALIFORNIA RAHLROAD COMBINE—HOW COMPOSED—ITS CONTINUITY—THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY.

It must then be premised that the management of the Central Pacific road has been substantially unchanged from its organization to the present day. The first of the continuity of design, system, policy, partners. There has been an absolute continuity of design, system, policy, methods, and practices from the beginning, so that we may speak of the management at all times as continuous. The form of the combine remained unchanged down to 1884, when it took a corporate shape, as to the "Southern Pacific Company."

The original Central Pacific combination consisted of Collis P. Huntington, Leland Stanford, Mark Hopkins, Charles Crocker, and E. B. Crocker. They madertook the building and financing of the Central Pacific road, and shared not here material. The last-name section of the partners is disputed and not here material. The last-name section of the presence of the survivors sought a volume of the company of the contral Pacific road, and childless; his widow retained his interest and took his place. The others were now growing old, and to husband their energies the survivors sought a volumer of the contral Pacific road, not husband their energies the survivors sought a volumer of the central Pacific road, northward up the Sacramento Valley, and southward through that of the San Joaquin, and building the Southern Pacific road. Colton was very active in the management. He died, however, concern to become an essential pack as and not be not progressed to buy his interest. This was done quite promptly, but in a manner and under circumstances that led to a subsequent action by Mrs. Colton to set aside the such as a continuous of the survivors south at he had rendered, it became necessary to outly his interest. WHAT PROPERTY THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY OWNS.

WHAT PROPERTY THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC COMPANY OWNS.

It never had any cash capital. The stocks held by the organizers were transferred to it at some agreed prices bearing no relation to their actual value, and its stock issued in payment therefor. Thus it owns the stocks of all the other railroad and transportation companies which its managers have from time to time built or purchased, except the Central Pacific, and nothing more. A few shares of each are placed in the names of dummies in their, employ, or under their control, to qualify them as directors of the various companies, and thus the doings of these corporations are dictated and controlled by the single will which controls the Southern Pacific Company. As every road whereof it owns the stock is mortgaged for far beyond its value or cost, the value of the stocks which constitute its whole capital is obviously but nominal. Whenever additional property is acquired it is at once duly mortgaged for all it will possibly bear, and subject to such mortgage transferred to or held by the Southern Pacific Company.

The Southern Pacific Company chooses the directors and controls the management of all these roads of which it is the lessee, besides owning the stock. It finances them all, gets all their cash into a common purse, manages their sinking funds, lending the money of one to the other, and that of the other to a third, and so round the circle fill it comes back to where it started, and the whole thing becomes a mere matter of bookkeeping, needing no unnecessary and inconvenient payments of cash. The lease of the various roads other than the Central Pacific is styled the "Omnibus lease." It has been lauded as a method of insuring unity and economy of management, etc. The principal feature, however, which a studious reader will be apt to recognize in it is a clause which, reversing the old rule of reserving a rent to be paid by the lessee to the lessor, provides that the lessees shall have 10 per cent of the proceeds of the business for managing and taking care of the property of the company whereof they own the whole stock. While the lessees continue to own all the stock this may be harmless; but whenever they shall put any of those stocks on the market and succeed in making sales of them, the purchasers may be expected to discover its radical dishonesty when they find a portion of the stockholders, in their capacity of lessees, absorbing 10 per cent of the proceeds of the business before leaving a cent for them.

Members of Congress should also be informed that the Pacific Improvement Company (commonly writter P. I. Co.) is another of the protean corporate forms under which these railroad managers mask their operations, just as the Western Development Company was before it, and the Contract and Finance Company before it, in turn; continually changing in name, ever the same in fact.

THE SITUATION IN 1870—COMMENCEMENT OF THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC ROAD.

What is now called the Southern Pacific Railroad began with the construction of a road from San Francisco 89 miles south to Gilroy. It was completed in 1889. Mr. Huntington intimates—in fact asserts—that it was done by his Southern Pacific Railroad Company; but this is one of those curious lapses of memory to which some persons are subject, by which they not only forget what occurred, but remember exactly what did not! The fact is, neither he nor any company he was connected with built a single mile of it. It was built by Peter Donahue, Henry M. Newhall, and Charles B. Polhemus (the last named is still living), under the corporate name of the San Francisco and San Jose Railroad Company, and that of the Santa Clara and Pajaro Valley Railroad Company; to build and equip it cost about $1,300,000, and it was in use as a local road. In 1865 a company was organized in San Francisco by eight or ten gentlemen—William T. Coleman, Timothy Guy Phelps, Charles N. Fox, and others, under the name of "The Southern Pacific Railroad Company," but it had no actual capital and built no road; was in fact a mere paper organization. There was another company organized in 1870 called the Callfornia Southern Railroad Company, which was in similar plight. By this time some progress had been made in selling the shares of the Central Pacific Company, though Mr. Huntington and his associates continued to retain its management. They decided on building another road which by its more advantageous location, more favorable grades, and preferable approach to the city of San Francisco to direct, would be able to successfully rival it in business. With this view they purchased from Messrs. Newhall, Donahue, and Polhemus the stock of the two roads first above mentioned (from San Francisco to Gilroy). The route designated was from San Fran

In July, 1875, the Southern Pacific Railroad Company executed a mortgage for $45,000,000 to trustees, dated April 1 of that year, covering the whole of their road existing and contemplated (being, as described, 1,150 miles in length, or at the rate of $40,000 per mile of road). A large amount of these bonds was issued to the construction company, and the problem before Mr. Huntington and his associates was to sell these bonds, and, until sales could be effected, to give them an apparent or prospective value, which might meantime render them available as collateral security.

People investing in railroad bonds naturally look at the earnings of the road as a guide to estimate values, and as the San Joaquin Valley south of Goshen was then quite unsettled, and could furnish neither freight nor passengers to the new road, they determined to make a show of business over it by using the credit of the Central Pacific Company. For this purpose they made a lease, dated September 1, 1876, to the latter company of the branch of the Southern Pacific Railroad extending from Goshen southward to the Colorado River, constructed and to be constructed, for $5,000 per annum for every mile thereof built and ready for operation. The rent would thus increase by six thousand per annum with every additional mile of road built. From this rent, however, the lessees were permitted to deduct $3,000 per mile per annum for operating expenses. And, probably to divert the attention of the Central Pacific stockholders from the importance as well as the dishonesty of this lease, it was made terminable by a notice of sixty days, as if it were a mere temporary arrangement. The very circultous mode here resorted to of reaching a rent of $3,000 per mile per annum naturally suggests a sinister design, and there was one, quite in harmony with the whole knavish proceeding of which it formed a part. The object was to enable the Southern Pacific Railroad to appear in the financial publications of the day as earning from this branch of its road, while yet unfinished and without a terminus at either end, $0,000 per mile per annum, and being operated at 50 per cent of its gress earnings. Obviously a road through a new country which, while yet in an unfinished condition—running, in fact, from no place to no place—could make so this fraudulent lease, therefore, were arranged for the purpose of deceiving the public, by holding out false and delusive prospects of earning the capacity of the road, and thus rendering the disposal of the bonds more easy. The making of this lease, and the particular form of reservation of rent in it, were both parts of a dishonest contrivance to bolster up the credit of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company at the expense of the Central, and to enable Messrs. Huntington and associates, while acting as directors and trustees of the latter company, to hypothecate and afterwards sell the bonds of the former. It need scarcely be said that this constituted a gross fraud on under that of all civilized countries, the last-named company is entitled to recover from its dishonest trustees all gains and profits of every kind derived from it, and this without any participation in or allowance for their labor or risk in the venture.

The disgraceful history of this issue of bonds of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company is not yet all told, nor the published evidence of the fraudulent design exhausted. They were inscribed on the stock list and offered on the New York exchange; tolds, offers, washed sales, and all means (even down to a lectitious sale of a lot of them un

OTHER FRAUDS IN CENTRAL PACIFIC MANAGEMENT.

1. We have already mentioned the ninety-nine-year lease of the Central Pacific road to the Southern Pacific Company (of Kentucky). Considering the relative positions of the several parties, the ownership by the lessees of the whole stock of the rival road and that of the Southern Pacific Company's stock by those managing the Central Pacific direction, it can not be doubted that this lease would be pronounced by any court of equity a gross fraud on the Central Pacific Company. Its ruinous character is obvious.

We will not dwell on the diversion of traffic from the Central to the Southern route, though the loss of revenue by the former from that cause must have been enormous. Owning all the stock of the one road and having no interest in the other, while they managed both, it was perhaps but natural for such parties to favor their own road at the expense of the other. The power to do so was obviously a principal motive for the minety-nine-year lease, the terms of which, it may be remarked, left them at liberty to change the rent from time to time practically at discretion. To assert that they exercised with impartiality great powers so dishonestly obtained would be to invite derision, not belief. The Kentucky corporation, as lessee of both roads, did the carrying, issued the bills of lading, etc., so that unless the shipper took special pains (for which there was rarely a motive) to expressly direct his freight sent over the Central route, it was at the discretion of the carriers, and naturally went by the Southern. The arrangement of time schedules, greater promptness in delivering freight, adjusting reclamations, and like considerations helped to determine the choice of shippers in the same direction. The revenues of the Central Pacific road rapidly fell off, and its dividends went down to 3 and 2 per cent, and finally to zero.

2. For many years after the completion of the Central Pacific road its managers were the largest borrowers of money in the San Francisco market, and large borrowers wherever they could obtain it. Any person having a sum of any magnitude to loan could have from them the note or the indorsement of the Central Pacific Railroad Company. None of this money was for the use of the Central Pacific Company, but for that of the managers; yet the credit of the Central Pacific Company, but secret—but it is the fact, and the history and proof of it are about as follows:

THE SECRET DIVIDENDS OF 1895, 1898, AND HOW BROUGHT ABOUT.

It is known that the great bulk of the Central Pacific stock is held in England. It was sold to English purchasers between 1875 and 1890 by the device of paying large dividends on it, while at the same time the sellers were building the Southern Pacific road to take away its business, as above related. The Englishmen were deterred from transferring their shares to their own names by the artful suggestion of individual liability for corporate debts, and more especially for the Government subsidy bonds under California law. Their holdings were therefore represented by certificates in the names of former holders, indorsed in blank. To facilitate concealment of ownership a form of certificates was invented, with dividend coupons attached; so that the holder need not have a receipt for his dividends or even present hinself to get them. No one could know his identity except the banker with whom he deposited his coupons. These former holders were employees of the company, to whom the managers had transferred their shares in lots of 10, 20, 30, 50, 100, 200, 300, and 500 shares, which, being indorsed, passed from hand to hand by delivery only. Proxies for voting were taken in all cases from these employee shareholders, which, as the stock remained on the companies' books in their names, have enabled the sellers ever since to elect the directors and control the management of the company. Dividends paid under a former arrangement ceased some two years since, and after a period of waiting the Englishmen became dissatisfied with the management, and after meetings and consultations dissatisfied with the management, and after meetings and consultations dissatisfied with the management, and after meetings and consultations details and the could for them from the directors of the company. Sir Rivers came to California, interviewed the officers of the company and his examinations, etc., a

THE POSITION OF THE CENTRAL PACIFIC.

THE POSITION OF THE CENTRAL PACIFIC.

Some slight compensation, it appears, Mr. C. P. Huntington is willing to make to the Central Pacific shareholders, since he has stated, through Sir Rivers Wilson, that he will undertake to pay 1 per cent per annum in the shape of dividends until "satisfactory legislation has been obtained for the adjustment of the company's debt to the Government," after which rather vague date 2 per cent per annum is to be paid for the period of two years, during which the shareholders will have time to review their position and to consider the advisability of endeavoring to effect an arrangement of a more permanent and more profitable character. Sir Rivers Wilson takes the same view of the position of the company'as that of the Economist, and, indeed, that of most of those who have considered the facts. The Central Pacific is at present in the grasp of the Southern Pacific, which is virtually Mr. Huntington in what may be termed a corporate form. It would have remained a profitable undertaking if the present lessees had not worked its ruin. In the future, probably it can be best worked in connection with the Southern Pacific, provided equitable terms can be arranged; and finally, as there is nothing really to fear in the theoretical liability on the shares, holders should at once, without delay, register, so as to make their voting power efficient. If that be done, and if terms can be made with the Government. English investors may ultimately suffer less loss than once appeared probable. They will, however, have to be very careful in approaching Congress. They must remember that they have no claim to anything save that which is given by the strict letter of the law. If they have been swindled by the "bosses" in control of the company, which is often alleged, not only have many others suffered in the same way, but few have been guilty of so much contributory negligence. It has also to be remembered that if the shareholders have not fared well, the United States Government made a bad bargain over the subsidy which it granted to the Central and Union Pacific companies. And, of course, it is scarcely necessary to assert that the fact of the credit of the United States having so greatly improved is no reason whatever why one of its debtors whose credit has not improved, to put it mildly, should get free from the obligation. As a matter of fact, the American Government does not, we think, want to foreclose, for simply as a question of expediency that would be unadvisable, and therefore if the company sues, as it is bound to do in forma pauperis, Congress will probably come to some fair arrangement, despite the apparently hostile position which it has recently assumed.

Four weeks after the publication of this article, Mr. Huntington replied to it under his own signature, as follows:

MR. HUNTINGTON AND THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILROAD.

To the Editor of the Economist.

MR. HUNTINGTON AND THE CENTRAL PACIFIC RALLROAD.

To the Editor of the Economist.

Sir: Some one has sent me a clipping from your issue of March 23. The Economist has been sent to me occasionally for years, and I have heretofore considered it one of the best financial papers published in England. That being so, I do not think its editor would knowingly do any individual or corporation wrong.

I was the principal factor in building the Central Pacific road; that is, I organized the company, and sold all the securities, I believe. I intended to deal fairly with all people having dealings with the company, and I believe I have done so.

The Government, as you know, granted aid to two other lines—the Northern Pacific and Atlantic and Pacific (Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe)—which not only divided the tonnage, but cut down the rates; and later other roads were built, so that there are now substantially seven roads crossing the continent when one double-track railroad could do all the business that is being done, and much more, without any particular inconvenience.

If anybody has any charge to make of any particular thing that I have done that was unfair, I would like to have him tell me what it is. No one up to this time has told me, or intimated that there was any particular charge, but in a general way some of the California mewspapers and some of the discharged employees have been wildly throwing words into the air to the effect that something had been done somewhere or at some time, but they do not state where or how.

The Central Pacific should have cost twice as much to build as any other road did, as the physical obstructions to overcome were much greater, and all the cost of construction, for grading, timber work, such as the bridges, ties, etc.—in fact, everything that was furnished in the building of the road, excepting rails, fastenings, and rolling stock—was paid for in gold in the six ties, when gold was at a high premium. The coal we had to use as fuel cost us for many years an average of over $8 a ton

New York, April 3, 1895.

Mr. Huntington, it will be seen, does not deny the correctness of the Economist's statement of the agreement, but pleads in confession and avoidance, that he was the chief factor in building the road and sold all its securities, and that he has not put it in the hands of a receiver; he adds that he has not been informed of any specific charges of misconduct against himself. This defense, so far as it goes, is partly true. Mr. Huntington has not put the road into the hands of a receiver, probably because he preferred to receive himself. Buthe does, by his eloquent silence, distinctly confess that to pacify the English stockholders, represented by Sir Rivers Wilson, he agreed with that gentleman that they should be paid, in the shape of dividends on their stock, I per cent per annum until satisfactory legislation has been obtained for the adjustment of the company's debt to the Government, "after which 2 per cent per annum should be paid for two years more," to permit the shareholders to review their position and consider the advisability of endeavoring to effect an arrangement of a more permanent and profitable character. These statements can leave no doubt of the agreement with Sir Rivers Wilson, but they are at the moment of writing confirmed, if confirmation were needed, by an interview with Col. C. F. Crocker, vice-president of the Southern Pacific Company, published in the San Francisco Chronicle of December 2, 1896, wherein he says: "The Central Pacific is not on velvet, but it is not in the depths of despair into which the Northern Pacific has fallen, and the stockholders have been receiving a small dividend every year." The payment of this secret dividend is then established.

Amount of this Largess—By Whom Pall, and Why—Fallsifying Annual. NEW YORK, April 3, 1895.

AMOUNT OF THIS LARGESS—BY WHOM PAID, AND WHY—FALSIFYING ANNUAL REPORTS TO CONCEAL IT.

AMOUNT OF THIS LARGESS—BY WHOM PAID, AND WHY—FALSIFYING ANNUAL REPORTS TO CONCEAL IT.

To pay a dividend of 1 per cent on the stock of the Central Pacific Company requires $672,000, an amount too large to be overlooked by a slip in book-keeping, or to be easily concealed under some general head. And the question whence comes the money wherewith they are paid is not without importance; for these great railroad companies, whether we regard them as quasi-public corporations, or as organized solely for private gain, are certainly exercising great public franchises and trusts which affect large numbers of people. They publish annual reports of their dealings and business, on the truth of which millions of dollars are invested, frequently the funds of unprotected and helpless people, and even legislation is predicated. The publication of falsehood or the suppression of truth in such reports is, therefore, an offense against public morals of the gravest sort, which not even the most devoted partisan would venture to defend, or propose to condone. We have searched the annual reports of the Southern Pacific Company and of the Central, both those made under eath and laid before the State Railroad Commissioners, and those printed by themselves for public information, without being able to find one word on these dividends or any alusion to them; the inference seems inevitable of an intent to conceal them from Congress and the public. Surely the Congress of the United States will exact from applicants for its bounty, at least the homage of respect for truth, in the representations on which it is called to act! The payment or amount of these dividends is not of so much importance as the duplicity and falsehood of the managers which it reveals. And the question comes right home to Mr. Huntington, personally, for the bargain was made with, and the promises made by him, and the reports from which it is suppressed bear his signature, and are distributed by himself and with his sanction. Failing to disclose the truth in a matter

Denied authoritative information as to the motives for or the source of this extraordinary dividend, which was paid to the stockholders without being earned by the company, declared by the board of directors, or shown on the books of account, we are driven to conjecture; and the suggestion arises that they may be paid by one or more of the guilty directors or other persons interested in placating the dissatisfied stockholders and passing the refunding bill. This conjecture is not without probability, and if accepted, public opinion will not be apt to hesitate long as to the name of the distributor of such lavish largess or in conjecturing its motive. A settlement made with the United States, embodied in an act of Congress, which at the same time condones so many and such monstrous frauds, insures his Southern Pacific road, or eighty-eight years to come against the competition of the Central Pacific road, and gives to his dishonest ninety-nine-year lease the sanction of the law of the land, may well be worth double or treble the sum required to pay these dividends—say §4.082,000.

Another probable conjecture is that the arrangement is designed to permit the English stockholders to sell out their holdings and shift the loss on other victims, which perhaps two years' time with dividends meantime at 2 percent per annum may enable them to do. Such a course may seem to them preferable to litigation with an adversary whom they have been led to believe the only man capable of handling the United States Congress, and who, if this measure passes, will readily be credited with like power to 'handle' the President, and thus capable of calling down on them the thunders of Olympian Jove in the shape of an Executive option to call in the debt the instant they dare to attack the lease which has been their ruin.

In any case for Congress, in face of the revelations here made, to pass a refunding act based, as all such propositions are, on the supposed inability of the company to pay its debt—without a previous clear explanation understanding of this transaction, whether it represents dividends or hush money, would be to put itself in the position of appearing as either the dupo of designing men or their instrument in deceiving others, neither position very designing men or their instrument in deceiving others, neither position very designing men or their instrument in deceiving others, neither position very design of the content of interior of California or Nevada, on the line of the road, had to be hauled to San Francisco and back to destination, to swell the cost. By special favor and on payment of the whole freight both ways, the interior merchant might obtain permisson to have his goods delivered as they passed his door. At another time they imposed a protective duty of a cent a pound on refined sugars coming here from the east, and, as believed, for a consideration of $100,000 paid by parties interested. The charge was publicly made * at the time by responsible parties and never denied. Silence under such circumstances amounted to an admission. At another they introduced here a system of special contracts to be enforced by boycotting, twhich if long continued would infallibly have riven our community into two hostile factions. This infamous and doubtless illegal special-contract system was broken up by the construction of competing roads, but by their system of leases they undoubtedly aim to revive it. By their omnibus lease and the lease of the Central Pacific road, they have united practically all the roads in the State under the management of a foreign corporation, which in turn is under the control of a single individual, whose greed has no limits and who avows that he has no other or higher standard of right than his own opinion. He has never made public his general coderof morals, if he has any, but in letters to his former associate he exhibits his ideas on procuring Congressional legislation to be in brief to bribe those who will accept and villify those who will not.

By this combination they for years simultaneously withheld payment of railroad taxes, unhinging the machinery of the State government and throwing the public service out of gear. Public schools closed, supervisors, legislators, and executive officers bribed, injunctions defied, and all this under the pretense of ascertaining the constitutionality of an enactment procured by themselves and passed for their benefit. When, however, the opportunity of a decision pr offenses would unduly expand this memorial, and they must be passed over with mere mention. But the tax litigation was so grievous an injustice to the State, and the dishonorable and collusive manner in which it was managed are so susceptible of record proof, that we give it briefly, as follows: THIRTEEN YEARS. LITIGATION OVER A SCHEME OF TAXATION EXACTED AT THERE OWN SUGGESTION AND FOR THIS BENEFIT—COLLUSIVE SUIT—INFOSITIONS PRACTED ON UNITED STATES COURTS, EXC.

In 1879 a provision was incorporated in our fatte constitution excepting. The control of the control of the constitution excepting to mortificate, it was done at the instance of the railroad people themselves, to enable them to sell their Southern Pacific bonds, which, if subject to local taxation in California, would obviously have been impossible. THE CENTRAL PACIFIC CAN BE REOBGANIZED ON SAFE AND SOLVENT BASES, BY CALLING IN THE SUMS DUE IT FROM SOLVENT DEBTORS.

The exigencies of space forbid further enlargement on this branch of the subject. Enough has been said to show the need of a thorough investigation of the relations of the Central Pacific Company to the parties who have so long held it in their grasp, and the enforcement of its just claims against them. This done, it will be found that so far from being insolvent, the company can easily be reorganized as a great trunk line to the Pacific Coast, competing fairly with all others, and, on the basis of solvency and honest management, manifestly to the advantage of the Government as a creditor and of its own stockholders. In any event the property, if it has to be sold, can be then offered with knowledge of what it consists of and what its carning capacity is—things at present absolutely unknown to anyone but the Southern Pacific combination, who have for so many years past managed its affairs to its own destruction. It must not be forgotten to extend the payment or refund this debt as proposed is practically to sell the road to its present management on a credit of a hundred years, taking their promise to pay in small installments. Congress does not, nor does any of its members, or any executive officer of the United States, or indeed anybody, know what property you are selling. No inventory of it exists; and this ignorance shuts off all competitive bidding. It is now fairly established and undeniable that for numerous important purposes the Central route has decided advantages for through business over all others. All the products of this coast destined for Eastern points, valuable enough to pay for transportation by rail, give it the preference for climatic reasons. For passenger traffic, which is 40 per cent of the whole business,* it has the call over all the others—the Southern (Sunset) line is, in fact, discontinued during summer. It does not admit of doubt that each of the great trunk lines would be prompt to compete for the Central Pacific property, if offered at auction, with inventory. Without such it would not probably elicit any reasonable bids, for however large or valuable the property, no purchaser would be likely to count on receiving from the tenants delivery of anything beyond the road itself, with a wretched skeleton equipment incapable of doing the business.

The stockholders of the road, who appear to have at last awakened to the necessity of inquiry into the wrongs perpetrated by their agents the directors, are organizing in defense of their property, and if they have an opportunity will scarcely permit the trunk lines to be the only competitors at such sale. As indicated by their published proceedings, they are making intelligent efforts to help themselves and resume control of their property. They will probably effect a reorganization of the company. The people of California, so far from offering factious opposition to a reorganization which shall preserve the Central road as an independent and competing line of transportation, managed by its actual owners as designed by Congress, will heartily welcome it.

We believe that al

We here resume briefly the grounds of our opposition to the pending measure to refund the debt of the Central Pacific Railroad Company to the United States (Senate bill No. 2894, House bill No. 2895).

1. The recognition and confirmation of the ninety-nine-year lease to the Southern Pacific Company reverses the settled policy of the United States with respect to these Pacific railroads as established by previous acts of Congress and promoted by grants of the public domain of many million acres. It substitutes consolidation and monopoly for competition and freedom of trade; it gives over the Central road to the management of its great competitor in business, depriving the people of the West of the advantages of competition in transportation for which they have paid these people liberally and Congress has subsidized them munificently.

The proposal is quite new; has never been publicly discussed, advocated, or even mentioned. It is furtively introduced in the ninth and nineteenth sections of the pending bill under the disguise of an advantage to the United States. In fact, it can serve no purpose but to confirm the grasp of the Southern Pacific Company on the Central road and enable it by routing freight to starve the Union Pacific into obedience to its commands.

2. The proposed guaranty of the Southern Pacific Company is worthless; a mere illusion. That company owns no property worth speaking of which is not already mortgaged for vastly beyond its cost or value.

The Southern Pacific Company is a fraudulent and predacions concern, got up to perpetuate the control of dishonest directors of the Central Pacific Railroad Company over the road after they had sold their interest in it, and of absorbing the profits of that and other companies by means of fraudulent leases. So plain was this attis origin that its original charter from the State of Kentucky forbid it to build or operate railroads within that Commonwealth.

3. The relief asked for the Central Pacific road is based on false suggestions of Kentucky forbid it to build or operate railroads within that Commonwealth.

3. The relief asked for the Central Pacific road is based on false suggestions and concealment of material facts. So far from being unable to provide for the payment of its debt to the Government, it is possessed of assets of enormous value—collectible claims against its former directors for moneys and credits misappropriated by them amounting to many millions. These should be called in and applied to the sinking fund. Asking indulgence here on the ground of poverty, its stockholders are receiving dividends on their shares to-day, and have the promise of their lessee and advocate that they shall be doubled as soon as the bill passes. The secrecy of this dividend, the fact that it has not been earned by the road, declared by the directors, if such be the facts, and that it is not shown on the books of the company, so far from redeeming it from the imputation of frand, renders it more conspicuously objectionable. If this be the case, it is evidently "hush money" paid by the guilty parties to secure Congressional confirmation of the ninety-nine-year lease; and the sum agreed to be paid for it (which is essentially a bribe to silence opposition) bespeaks the nefariousness of the transaction and the value attached to a condonation of it.

4. By passing this bill, Congress will prolong the life of this railroad company for some seventy years beyond the limit fixed for its existence by the law of the State that created it. To do this without the consent or against the unanimous protest of the State would be not only an act of gross discourtesy to the State of California, but a grave injury and outrage to her people, who have for the past twenty-eight years suffered at the hands of these managers outrage and wrong past all endurance, rendering it justly odious and detested of all men.

*The Central Pacific road used to furnish statements of details of through and local business, and of the amounts derived from freight, express, passen-gers, and baggage, but since the year 1884 has withheld such information. From the printed report of December 31, 1884, we learn that—

The total earnings of the year were $22,166,106.00
Of which 74 per cent was from local business $16,216,902.00
And 26 per cent from through business, or 5,949,204.00

22, 166, 106, 00

Of the through earnings— The receipts from passengers and baggage were $2,383,096.00 or 40 per cent.

And from freight and express $3,566,096.00 or 60 per cent.
The local business shows the same proportions between freight and pas-

5. The management of the road has been continuous from the beginning; they have shown themselves by their published correspondence among themselves to be corruptionists of the worst kind.

6. They have broken faith with Congress, by soliciting and accepting a land grant as the consideration for building the whole Southern Pacific road, a hundred or more miles of which was over a mountain pass. They have taken and appropriated the valuable part of the grant, and left the difficult mountain part of the road unbuilt. Their correspondence shows the breach of faith was intended from the beginning.

7. They have broken faith with the public in the same way as with the Government; borrowed $22,000,000 on the undertaking to build a continuous line of rail from San Francisco to the Colorado River, and left a mountain gap of a hundred miles of it unbuilt, and have even renounced the building of it.

8. Similar frauds in the matter of terminals. They are unreliable.

9. Refunding the Central Pacific debt is wholly unnecessary. The company can be reorganized on the basis of solvency if Congress will but authorize a receiver appointed in foreclosure to avoid all fraudulent conveyances; get in the assets of the company and apply such as are not needed for transportation purposes to the sinking fund in the United States Treasury.

10. As 75 per cent of the revenues of the Central Pacific road are derived from local traffic, and from 15 to 18 per cent more from California products seeking a market abroad, and goods brought from abroad for consumption for sale here, on all of which we pay the freight, the people of California feel that all of the plunder which its former directors are permitted by Congress to retain will be saddled on them. There is little doubt that as much as from twenty-five to thirty millions can be recovered from the sinking fund from Huntington and the Crocker estate. Why should they be abandoned without an effort and saddled on the people of this State?

OVERLAND RAILROAD RATES.

To the Editor of the Nation.

Sir: Two paragraphs in the Nation of July 14 (No. 837, pp. 22, 23) indicate that you are but imperfectly informed as to abuses on the overland railroads. As you appear willing to aid in remedying them, I give you some of the facts. The system of unlawful freight discriminations alluded to has not been recently revived; it has never for a moment been suspended since its formal introduction in the summer of 1878, but has been constantly enlarged and extended down to the present time, when it is more stringent and oppressive than ever before. The modus operand is this: By arrangement between the Central and Union Pacific railroad companies the rates of western-bound freights are fixed by the Union and those of eastern-bound by the Central Company. This arrangement is supposed to be nominal only; a sort of legal fiction to enable each concern to refer complaining parties to a "Mr. Jorkins," 2000 miles off; but that is the form of it. The Union Pacific Company has a printed classification of merchandise, and printed rates of freight for each class from New York and other Eastern points to San Francisco, ranging from $6 per 100 pounds for first-class to $1.50 per 100 pounds for freight for each class from New York and other Eastern points to San Francisco, ranging from $6 per 100 pounds for first-class to $1.50 per 100 pounds for freight for each class from New York and other Eastern points to San Francisco, ranging from $6 per 100 pounds for first-class to $1.50 per 100 pounds for freight for each class from these regular notes. But the company enters into contracts with the merchants here to carry for them at special rates, much reduced from these regular ones, on condition that the merchant shall import all his goods by their line; not only such as are usually sent by rail or via the 1sthmus, but also such as have herefore, and naturally, come by sea around Cape Horn; and they make him bind himself to ship by their road, and by such connecting roads as their cover the expense of the round trip. The standing forced loan exacted from our merchants, without interest, by collecting and after thirty days repaying the difference between printed and contract rates, may amount to half a million dollars; it operates oppressively to individuals, but to the community is of minor importance. But the tax levied on our exports in the form of enhanced freights to Europe is a monstrous and shocking wrong. In the absence of full statistics it is impossible to compute its amount, but it is probably equivalent to about $\pm$4 per ton on the exportable crop of the State. San Francisco, under this nefarious system, has degenerated from the rank and position of a maritime city open to the commerce of the world to that of an interior town some 2,000 miles west of St. Louis, approachable only over the world to that of an interior town some 2,000 miles west of St. Louis, approachable only over With these facts before you, which are known to every well-informed man in San Francisco (except, of course, the railroad commissioners), you can understand why the tide of prosperity which has spread over the rest of the Union during the last few years has never yet reached California, why all business has been depressed and real estate has been steadily raillar or additionally and the same property of the state of the Union during the last few years has never yet reached California, why all business has been depressed and real estate has been steadily raillar roads) which has found expression in some of our recent legislation. Overland Raliroad Rates.

To the Editor of the Nation.

Sir: Since the publication of my letter on overland railroad rates in the Nation of August II, Mr. Charies F. Adams, jr., has caled my attention to the origin of the system of special freight contracts and unlawful discrimination in freight charges, as set forth in the report of the Government directors of the Union Pacific Railroad for the year ending June 30, 1878. I quote from page 15 of the document:

"In the month of July last, a sudden announcement was made that the tariffs on through-freighting business over the Pacific roads had been altered, and that, while the classification of certain articles had been changed, the rates upon others had been advanced from 50 to 100 per cent. The reason of this movement, which naturally excited surprise as well as indignation among those affected by it, was not at first apparent. It was, however, soon learned. It was purely strategic. The company did not really propose to raise its tariff rates; on the contrary, it was ready to slightly reduce them; but it did propose to take full advantage of its position to secure as much as possible of the transcontinental business. As a first step toward this, it practically did away with its open tariff, by the very simple process referred to. Under the open tariff, at the old rates, the larger business firms dealing between the two coasts had a choice of routes—that by water and that by rail. They, in practice, availed themselves of this option by sending their coarser freights, or those in regard to which time in delivery was immaterial, by water, at the lower rates; while the more costly wares, or those requiring immediate delivery, were forwarded overland. The object of the Union Pacific was to put a stop to this practice. This they did by largely raising their freights, which put an effectual stop to shipments under the open tariff, while, at the same time, they offered to all the large firms which would contract to make their shipments wholly by land special rates at a

"It is unnecessary to comment on such a method of corporate management. It speaks for itself. Meanwhile, so far as the measure is concerned, the objections to it are apparent. The through business over the Union Pacific is mainly done by large houses. This is natural enough, for such houses can, of course, do it most cheaply. The measure under discussion, however, made it impossible that this business should be done by any but the large houses. They have special contracts covering it at less than the published tariff rates. More than this, it locks up, in secrecy, transactions which more than all others should be public. The special contracts may be equal as between shippers, or they may not. The directors have every reason to believe that they are, but they none the less are lacking in that element of publicity which in such matters will always remain the one real safeguard against discrimination."

"Divociting" clause quoted in my former letter: they merely bound the merchant or transport all his freight by rail, in gods purchased by or for and shipped or consigned to him by his procurement, directly or indirectly, or with his previous knowledge or consent;" he was still free to deal in goods which had reached here by sea, though he could not import them so himself. Next year, or the year following, the "bought, sold, dealt in, or handled by "clause was introduced, which" boycotted "all goods not imported by rail, so far as the railroad companies' customers were concerned. They were forbidden to buy, sell, deal in, or handle them. Last January the railroad companies gave another turn to the screw and introduced a clause which boycotts not only the goods but the importers. The merchant who holds a goods to anyone who is in the habit of importing otherwise than by rail. To show that there is no mistake about this humiliating exaction, I inclose on a separate slip the text of the covenant, as well as that of the corresponding clause in the contracts of the preceding year. They are clipped from the columns of the Grocer and Country Merchant, a local trade journal, which published them, with a vigorous protest, at the time they were forced upon our merchants. The space of the Nation is too valuable to insert them in extense here, but let them go into your advertising columns with a note of reference. They divide the importing merchants of the whole Pacific Costrail and those who refuse to do so. These two classes are forbidden by the railroad company to have any dealings with one another.

I make no comment on this proceeding, for I

THE NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

Mr. HAWLEY. The act constituting the National Academy of Sciences requires the association to make an annual report, and a permanent statute provides for the printing of that report. I do not know that anything more is necessary than merely to present it. It will follow the usual course and the matter will be printed. The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

I desire to have the bill (S. 3385) to refer certain claims for Indian depredations to the Court of Claims, which was introduced by me on December 15, 1896, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs instead of to the Committee on Indian Depredations. By the indorsement on the original bill it was to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, but by mistake it went to the wrong committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The change of reference will be made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 3487) relating to the jurisdiction of the court of appeals of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

He also introduced a bill (S. 3488) to create a board of trustees of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company, and to fund the bond debts thereof, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 3489) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize and encourage the holding of a transmississippi and international exposition at the city of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, in the year 1893," approved June 10, 1896, to repeal certain portions thereof, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Select Committee on International Expositions.

Mr. TURPIE introduced a bill (S. 3491) granting an increase of pension to Capt. John W. He also introduced a bill (S. 3493) for the relief of Pay Clerk Charles Blake, United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. THURSTON introduced a bill (S. 3496) to promote the safety of employees and shippers upon railroads by compelling common carriers to equip their freight cars with safety appliances to protect such persons from injury resulting from falling between freight cars; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

INDEPENDENCE OF CUBA.

Mr. MILLS. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read and laid on the table. I shall wish to-morrow morning to submit some remarks upon it.

^{*}The transaction is alleged to be in the shape of a contract to transport for the refiner 5,000,000 pounds of sugar at 2 cents per pound. Of course they could not charge any dealer a less rate than that voluntarily paid by so large a customer who pays his freight and is not at all particular as to the trans-portation of the goods.

The joint resolution (S. R. 188) in reference to the recognition of the independence of foreign governments was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the expediency of recognizing the independence of a foreign government belongs to Congress, and when Congress shall so determine, the Executive should act in harmony with the legislative department of the Government.

SEC. 2. That the independence of the Republic of Cuba ought to be, and hereby is, recognized, and the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated for salary and expenses of a minister to that Government whenever such minister shall be appointed by the President.

Mr. MILIS subsequently said: Lintroduced a joint resolution

Mr. MILLS subsequently said: I introduced a joint resolution and gave notice that I would submit some remarks on it in the morning. As the Senate has agreed to adjourn over until Monday, I give notice that I shall claim the attention of the Senate on Monday morning.

AMENDMENT TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on International Expositions, and ordered to be printed.

CLASSIFICATION AND GRADING OF CEREALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have in my hand a bill which I think will command the attention of the Senate and its unanimous approval. A similar bill has already passed the Senate in the last Congress. It is now reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It is a bill to provide for fixing a uniform standard of classification and grading of wheat, corn, oats, barley, and rye, and for other purposes. All the leading farming associations in the country have petitioned for the passage of the bill, and there can be no possible objection to it. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry recommended it with some slight amendments. I have it will ness. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio asks for the present consideration of a bill, which will be read for information,
The Secretary. A bill (S. 353) to provide for fixing a uniform standard of classification and grading of wheat, corn, oats, barley, and rye, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President—
Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire what committee that bill comes from?

Mr. CULLOM. That is what I myself should like to know.
Mr. SHERMAN. The bill comes from the Committee on Agri-of the country, and if there is any bill that affects the commerce of the country, and if there is any bill that properly belongs to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, I think this bill does. I never heard of the measure before.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was reported from the Committee on Agri-

Mr. SHERMAN. It was reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CULLOM. And not from our committee. I do not think the bill ought to be considered until some proper committee that has control of the subject has dealt with it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator that, in order to ascertain whether it is a classification for transportation by rail-

Mr. CHANDLER. I suggest to the Senator that, in order to ascertain whether it is a classification for transportation by railroads, we have the text of the bill read.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to inquire whether the bill is now reported for the first time or whether it is on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already stated that the bill was reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and that a similar bill was passed in the last Congress, I think by unanimous consent; but it was not acted upon in the other House. It is still pending in the other House. I am told the measure is supported by every farmers' organization from the highest to the lowest. It simply provides for a uniform classification of the grains raised by them. I can see no objection to it. However, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Gear] can state definitely in regard to the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I simply want to say that the question of the classification of freights is now under consideration by the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill does not concern freight at all, but the quality of wheat, the grades of wheat. That is all.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to the bill being read, so that we can see what it provides.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not deal with the question of freight.

Mr. GEAR. I will state that the bill simply relates to the classification of grain, and provides that, in the absence of a regular agreed classification by any board of trade or city, there shall be a classification of such grain, subject to the inspection of the Secretary of Agriculture. It has nothing to do with fixing the rate.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill ought to be read at any rate.

rate.

Mr. CULLOM. The bill ought to be read at any rate.

Mr. GEAR. It has nothing to do with any interstate-commerce matter. It does not infringe on the rights of that committee at all. Mr. CHANDLER. If it is a proposed national law to classify grain—that is the point I am trying to get at—perhaps the bill will show for what purpose a law of Congress shall classify farm products

Mr. GEAR. It simply authorizes a classification under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. CHANDLER. For what purpose? Why is it to be done?
Mr. GEAR. Suppose the gentleman orders a carload of grain from Chicago, or a shipload of grain from abroad to this country by steamer. There is nothing said about the classification, whether it shall be the Chicago classification or the New York classification. In the absence of such a classification, the bill provides that the purchaser shall be bound by the classification made under the bill, under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.
Mr. CHANDLER. If our States-rights friends are willing to

Mr. CHANDLER. If our States I gate vote for that, I am.
Mr. HOAR. Let us hear the bill read.
Mr. SHERMAN. It is a short bill.
Mr. CULLOM. Let us hear it read.
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.
The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and required, as soon as may be after the enactment hereof, to determine and fix, according to such standard as he may prescribe, such classification and grading of wheat, corn, rye, oats, and barley as in his judgment the usages of trade warrant and permit, having reference to the standard, classification, and grades now recognized by the several chambers of commerce and boards of trade of the United States: Provided, however, That reference to such various classifications and grades shall serve only as a guide and suggestion in the matter of determining and fixing by the Secretary the United States standard herein provided for; but he shall not be controlled thereby, but shall determine and fix such standard and such classifications and grades as will, in his judgment, best subserve the interest of the public in the conduct of interstate trade and commerce in grain.

Sec. 2. That when such standard is fixed and the classification and grades determined upon, the same shall be made matter of permanent record in the Agricultural Department, and public notice thereof shall be given in such manner as the Secretary shall direct, and thereafter such classifications and grades shall be known as the United States standard. All persons interested shall have access to said record at such convenient times and under such reasonable regulations as the Secretary may prescribe; and on payment of such proper charge as the Secretary may fix a certified copy of the classification and grades shall be those who may apply for the same.

Sec. 3. That from and after thirty days after such classifications and grades have been determined upon and fixed, and duly placed on record as herein provided, such classification and grading shall be taken and held to be the standard in all interstate trade and commerce in grain in all cases when no other standard is agreed upon: Provided, however. That in interstate t

Mr. HALE. That seems to me to be a very sweeping bill. It appears to be an assumption of great power on the part of the General Government. I did not discover in listening to the reading anything in the bill that reserves any classification that may have been made by a State or by any other authority. The only reservation is the sweeping enactment of the bill in favor of private contracts or agreements where a classification has been made. I do not suppose that would apply in hardly any case. It proposes to confer upon the Secretary of Agriculture the enormous power of fixing absolutely classifications touching these great subjects of trade.

I do not think that a bill of this kind ought to pass without Senators having an opportunity to examine it, and without debate, which, it seems to me, will certainly arise whenever it is put upon its passage

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill was passed by the Senate at the last

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Ohio says it was passed at the last Congress. The truth is, we passed a great many bills where requests are made for unanimous consent without Senators considering the subjects-matter, and they never get the illumination that only comes by debate. I do not think this is one of a class of Mr. ALLEN. Did the bill pass the Senate in the last Congress?

Mr. HALE. I understand the Senator from Ohio to say it did.
But was there a discussion of it? I did not know it.
Mr. ALLEN. This is the first I ever heard of the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. This is the first I ever heard of the blit.
Mr. HALE. The Senator from Ohio says it was passed. Was it discussed?

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from Nebraska says it is the first time he ever heard of it.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand the Senator from Maine to object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HALE. Yes; I think it had better go over.
Mr. ALLEN. I think it ought to go over by all means. It is certainly destructive of the interests of the producer of grain to put all his rights in the hands of the Agricultural Department.
Mr. BATE. Has the bill been printed and laid on our tables, I should like to inquire?
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was printed long ago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is Order of Business 950 on the Calendar

Mr. BATE. It is certainly a very important bill, and needs attention. I think it ought to be laid on our tables.

Mr. GEAR. Mr. President—
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that objection is interposed to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. GEAR. I will just state that the passage of the bill is desired by many boards of trade and by the agricultural societies of this country. It is indorsed, I believe, in a certain degree by the Secretary of Agriculture, and is asked by our farmer friends.

I will only state in one moment that the classification referred to simply relates to a case where there is no other classification agreed upon. If you or I order a carload or shipload of grain sent at the classification of the Chicago Board of Trade, this measure at the classification of the Chicago Board of Trade, this measure does not interfere, but where no agreement has been made the parties shall have a right to demand a national classification.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know anything about who has petitioned for the passage of this bill. I can not say anything respecting that matter. But we all know that the producers of grain in this country sell without any special contract. They have practically nothing to do whatever with classifying their grain. Here the power to classify their grain is taken entirely out of their hands by the bill, and the classification made by the Secretary of Agriculture, which will be usually the classification made by boards of trade, becomes a legal classification, binding upon the producer of grain in the courts of the country, which he can not dispute, notwithstanding the grain may grade higher than it has been classified by the Secretary of Agriculture or by his agent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to say a word. I have been requested to favor the measure by the farming associations in my State and I have also received communications from other States.

State and I have also received communications from other States. I introduced the bill at their request at this session, and in the last Congress I know it was passed by the Senate. I do not know whether there was any debate upon it or not. But I have read the bill very carefully and I do not find that it imposes any restriction whatever except such as will tend to protect not only the purchasers, but the consumers and producers, and by which a classification of the different kinds of grain may be fixed by some standard. It does not make so much difference what the standard is, so that we can have a standard, and wheat can be bought or sold according to a certain standard. This proposed law does not take away the right from anyone to make a contract for any standard he chooses, but it expressly reserves that right.

So far as the bill is concerned, I have done my duty. It was referred to the proper committee, the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and reported with some slight amendments. The bill was passed by the Senate, as I said, in the last Congress. I do not recall whether there was any debate upon it or not, but at any rate I think it is a bill that if Senators will read they will favor, especially those who represent agricultural States, like my friend from Nebraska [Mr. Allen]. With these remarks, I am perfectly willing to leave the matter to the Senate.

Mr. CULLOM. When I rose before in reference to this bill, from the reading of the title I supposed it was a bill affecting the question of transportation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. CULLOM. Therefore I made the remark that it ought to be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, having charge generally of that subject. But I find that it does not affect the question of transportation, and so far as I am concerned, while I should like to have an opportunity to read the bill over before it is put upon its passage, I do not desire to move to refer it to any other committee, unless the Senate seems to think it ought to be done. I think, though, the bill ought to go over until morning, so that we may see what there is in it.

Mr. ALLEN. Here the bill bear and a few many seems to the bill ought to go over until morning, so that we may see what there is in it.

Mr. ALLEN. Has the bill been reported from a committee?
Mr. CULLOM. It was reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I understand.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to make a suggestion in answer to the Senator from Ohio. The Senator seems to think that it is something in favor of the bill that it has preserved the right of contracts. I submit to the Senator from Ohio that Congress has not the power to trench upon the right of contracts; that they must be preserved regardless of your law. But the trouble with this bill is that an arbitrary grade established by the Secretary of Agriculture becomes binding, in case of litigation, upon the seller of wheat or cereals of any kind who may come under its provi-

Mr. SHERMAN. It applies only in cases where there is no contract as to grain.

Mr. ALLEN. Exactly.

Mr. SHERMAN. The right of private contract is preserved.

Mr. ALLEN. But we must legislate in the light of the fact that 99 per cent of the producers of grain make no contracts for their product.
Mr. HALE. And never make any.

Mr. ALLEN. And never make any contracts. Now, in consequence of a failure to make a special contract, are they to suffer quence of a failure to make a special contract, are they to suffer an arbitrary grading of their grain, which may, as a matter of fact, be far below its actual standard, but which is to be binding upon them in the courts of this country? The farmers of my State, for instance, do not follow their grain 600 miles to Chicago and have a contract for a specific grade.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am inclined to think from listening to the language of the bill that it is an entirely proper one to pass a State legislature. I was endeavoring to work in a suggestion in behalf of the Constitution of the United States. A bill classifying grain for the purposes of commerce may or may not be within the powers for the purposes of commerce may or may not be within the powers of Congress. I am not certain that it is not, because I myself attach great weight to the general-welfare clause of the Constitu-tion. Possibly this bill may be based upon the right of Congress to regulate weights and measures, or it may be a legitimate exercise of the power to regulate commerce between the States.

What I should like to know is, upon which specific clause in the Constitution the bill is based, or whether, if not based upon any specific clause, it is based upon the general-welfare clause? Let us have an understanding on this subject. If bills of this kind, that could be passed under the exercise of the police power of the States, are to be brought into the National Legislature and passed under the paternal powers given to Congress under the general-welfare clause, let that be understood. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio, who I see is rising, to tell me under what clause in the Constitution this bill emanates from the Committee on Agriculture and Foresti and Forestry.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not myself care to go into the constitutional question, although it is very easily answered. There is a full and able report accompanying the bill. I have read it partially, and I have it with me here. This report, made by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, covers these different points. I presume it was prepared by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Gear]. At all events, there is ample information upon the record to show exactly the tenor of the bill, the nature of it, and the ground upon which it can be defended.

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the report state under what clause in the Constitution of the United States the Congress has power to

Mr. CHANDLER. Does the report state under what clause in the Constitution of the United States the Congress has power to

Mr. SHERMAN. It may be done under the power to regulate commerce. Now, this is not a small matter.

Mr. CHANDLER. So I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a matter amounting to hundreds of millions of bushels of grain. We produce seventeen hundred or two thousand million bushels of corn; we produce, say, three or four hundred million bushels of wheat. There is now no fixed way of grading the wheat, and we all know there is a great difference in the value of wheat. Sometimes it is worth considerably more than at other times. Somebody should fix a grade on the wheat so as to describe it—so as to say grade No. 1 shall have such and such qualities, etc. It is sold in that way now by private contract, but those contracts differ. It may be one thing in Chicago, and it may be another in New York. The result is a complication of difficulties.

This bill emanates from the farmers. The farming organiza-tions sent the bill tome for its introduction. That was at this ses-It was introduced in the previous Congress by some other Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to submit to the Senator from Ohio a perplexing question, for the Senator is a great constitutional lawyer and is familiar with all its details and its history. Many of the States of the Union have laws by which their grains are graded.

Mr. CULLOM. That is true of Illinois. Mr. ALLEN. By those State laws the grains are inspected and

Mr. HALE. In almost all the States.

Mr. HALE. In almost all the States.

Mr. ALLEN. What will you do, for instance, under a law such as the bill before the Senate, with grain where it has been inspected and properly graded according to the law of the State before it was shipped from that State?

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that the bill provides for that very thing. It only provides for the grading of wheat that is not otherwise provided for by contract or by law.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will excuse me, that is not the provision of the bill. The bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall consider what regulations already exist by boards of trade or by law, and in terms declares that he shall not be governed by those, but shall establish an absolute standard unless in case of private contract. So it sweeps away every regulation, case of private contract. So it sweeps away every regulation, either by States or by boards of trade, and substitutes the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture, unless the parties have made a private contract, which, as the Senator from Nebraska says, is seldom the case.

Mr. ALLEN. But the Secretary of Agriculture may be guided altogether, if he sees fit, by the wishes of the boards of trade.

Mr. HALE. The bill provides that he may consult, but he shall

Mr. ALLEN. The bill provides that he may consult, but he shall not be governed thereby.

Mr. ALLEN. That is, he may, however.

Mr. HALE. He may consult.

Mr. ALLEN. He may. Then, suppose he is controlled by the action of boards of trade. There is no remedy, is there, to the producer of grain?

Mr. HALE. Not the least.

Mr. ALLEN. So the producer of grain is then really at the mercy of the board of trade.

Mr. HALE. He is at the mercy of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President—
Mr. BATE. As the debate has been going on for some time, I rise to a point of order. I understand that an objection was made to the consideration of the bill. Its consideration requires unanimous consent, and I make that objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The debate has been proceeding only by unanimous consent. Objection being interposed, the Chair recognizes the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DAVIS. I wished to submit a word on the bill. If objections

Mr. DAVIS. I wished to submit a word on the bill. If objection is made, I will refrain.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4566) to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

DISTRICT TELEPHONE LINE

The joint resolution (H. Res. 205) authorizing the building of a telephone line in the District of Columbia was read the first time by its title.

Mr. McMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be put upon its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read at length for information.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, as fol-

Resolved, etc., That authority is hereby granted to William J. Browning, Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives, to build a telephone line from the House folding room to the new annex folding room in the McDowell Building, corner of North Capitol street and Massachusetts avenue, using the Government poles now on North Capitol street.

Mr. McMILLAN. The joint resolution has just passed the other House, and it is a matter of importance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed. WESTERN JUDICIAL DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order. The first case on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 811) to provide a district attorney and a marshal for the western judicial district of the State of South Carolina was announced as first in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. CULLOM. I inquire if that bill comes from the Judiciary Committee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been reported from the Judiciary Committee, the Chair understands.
Mr. PLATT. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee about this bill, for, although a member of the committee, I do not remember about it. Does it involve the salaries of two sets of officers in South Carolina when there is now only one set? If so, as to the district attorney and marshal for the district of South Carolina, their salaries being fixed with reference to the performance of all the duties in the State, will their salaries go on at the same figure at which they now are, and then will there be other salaries for these new officers? I do not think I understand the matter.

Mr. HOAR. This bill was considered by the Judiciary Committee and reported at the last session. It had the support of the Senators from South Carolina and also support from the legal profession in the State. Of course the Senate is familiar with the condition of South Carolina. There have been two judicial districts there for a good while, but the marshal and the district attorney for one of the districts have performed the duties for the other. This bill provides for a separate marshal and a separate other. This bill district attorney.

If this bill should pass, then, of course, it will be necessary to have in the proper appropriation bill a new regulation as to the matter of the salary, which was regulated in the last appropriation bill with reference to one district alone; but it is not customary to make a new regulation of salaries until the law providing the salary has been first dealt with.

If this bill shall pass both Houses of the present Congress and be signed by the President, then it will be necessary to insert in the proper appropriation bill such diminution of the salaries of the officials who now perform the duties of both districts as is proper; but it never has been the custom, in creating new districts or providing new duties of this kind, to put such a provision into the special bill passed for the purpose.

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow me, I think that in the adjustment of salaries for the marshals of that State, with all the others, there was a reference in the statute to the peculiar condition of affairs in that State; but whether additional legisla-tion would not be required in order to specify the duties of the marshal and the district attorney, I am not sure. The Senator from South Carolina perhaps has before him the statute which was passed at the last session; and if so, I should like to hear what

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not the statute before me, but I know the substance of it. It provided that the duties of marshal and district attorney of the eastern district should be performed and their salaries fixed under it, but it provided for a division of the salaries—I have forgotten the exact amount—I think it was $2,500 for the western district and $1,500 for the eastern district. They are already differentiated or separated by the last statute fixing the salaries of the district attorneys and marshals of the various districts.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the Senator will allow the bill to go over for a minute, in order that we may see what the exact language of the statute is.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will allow me, this bill was reported from the Judiciary Committee on full consultation, as I have stated. That committee also reported as to the matter of salaries in a general salary bill for all the district attorneys in the country. That was referred to the Appropriations Committee and put on an appropriation bill and was settled after going into conference. I met that conference committee—indeed, I think I was one of the conferees—but the final action of the two Houses on the conference report took place after I left for Europe. So I am not prepared to answer precisely how that matter was arranged, but I am quite sure that is was arranged.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will allow me, it recognizes a difference in the districts, and fixes the salary for each district separately.

Mr. CULLOM. I will suggest, if the Senator will allow it, that the bill be passed over for the time being, so that we can examine it and see if the statute does not already provide for just such a situation as will exist if this bill shall become a law.

Mr. HOAR. No; the statute does not provide for new courts.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like the Senator to let the bill go through to-day, and then if any change is found necessary it can be attended to in the other House. The time is very short, and unless we get the bill across we are not very likely to get it through at this session.

Mr. CULLOM. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill as soon as we can find the provision of the law which we are looking for at this moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the bill will lie over temporarily.

Mr. CULLOM. I believe I have the provision of the law here.

Mr. HOAR. I can give it to the Senator. It is just as I stated.

The provision is:

For the eastern and western districts of the district of South Carolina, $4.500, $2,500 of which shall be for the performance of the duties of district attorney for the western district.

Mr. CULLOM. That is all there is of it?
Mr. PLATT. The salary is also divided.
Mr. TILLMAN. The salaries are separated.
Mr. CULLOM. That is the point I wanted settled before the bill passed, so as to be able to determine whether any additional legislation was necessary. I have no objection to the passage of

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN GREER COUNTY, OKLA.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent, out of order, for the consideration at this time of the bill (H. R. 7945) to provide for the entry of lands in Greer County, Okla., to give preference rights to settlers, and for other purposes. I will state it is important that legislation shall be had immediately. I therefore make this request.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE ARMED BRIG GENERAL ARMSTRONG.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next case on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (S. 687) to apply the unexpended balance of the amount heretofore appropriated for the relief of the captain, owners, officers, and crew of the late United States private armed brig General Armstrong, their heirs, executors, administrators, agents, or assigns, was announced as next in order; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. HAWLEY. Has that bill been called up for consideration?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been reached in regular order on the Calendar.

Mr. HAWLEY. From what committee is it reported

Mr. HAWLEY. From what committee is it reported?
The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Committee on the Judiciary.
Mr. HAWLEY. I have no doubt the bill is all right, and I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is familiar with it. I know there was something due to a number of people in connection with this matter, and I suppose the bill is properly guarded as to any future claims for any unexpended portion of his appropriation.

Mr. HOAR. As the Senator appeals to me, I can not say that I have now in my memory all the details of the case. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. Pugh] who reported the bill undoubtedly will remember them.

I suggest that the report be read. Mr. CULLOM.

Mr. HOAR. I will, however, make the general statement about the bill that, on very full debate, both Houses of Congress passed a bill for the relief of this claimant, in which the Secretary of State was authorized to pay him out of a certain fund in the State Department. That was misdescribed in some way in the law. The consequence was that the Secretary of State said he did not think he was authorized to make payment unless Congress amended the law and made the description of the fund more accurate, which he thought they ought to do. This bill is practically covered by the old law, and the bill is made necessary by an error of description in that law.

Mr. HAWLEY. As I remember the case I thinks considerable. Mr. HOAR. I will, however, make the general statement about

Mr. HAWLEY. As I remember the case, I think a considerable

Mr. HAWLEY. As I remember the case, I think a considerable portion of that appropriation has been paid out, and there has been some little controversy as to the persons to whom it should be paid; but I have forgotten exactly what the details are. I have great admiration for the gallant action in which the General Armstrong participated, as I believe everybody has who knows anything about that extraordinary affair. The Senator from Alabama will probably be able to give us the facts regarding the case.

Mr. CULLOM. I think the report should be read; it is not a long one, will not take much time, and will enable us to understand the history of the case.

Mr. PUGH. The report contains a letter from Solicitor-General Conrad which gives the history of this claim, with which he is perfectly familiar, and it is set forth in full in the report of the Judiciary Committee. I hope there will be no objection to the consideration of this claim. It is an old one, and Congress has made two attempts to take this unexpended balance of the appropriation and pay it over to the claimants, and it has passed two acts, which have failed of execution for reasons stated in the letter of the Solicitor-General and in the report of the Judiciary Comof the Solicitor-General and in the report of the Judiciary Committee

Mr. HAWLEY. I think that all the claims have been satisfied, as the matter now stands, and the only question is as to the unexpended balance.

Mr. CULLOM. If they are all satisfied, why dispose of this balance by giving it to somebody? We had better have a little money in the Treasury.

Mr. PUGH. I think we had better have the report read.

Mr. HAWLEY. I mean the claims aside from those of Mr.
Reid have been satisfied. That is what I meant. Is that not so?

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to have the report read, Mr.

President, in order that we may know the history of the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois calls for the reading of the report, which will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. Pugh

March 23, 1896:

The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration the bill (S. 687) to apply the unexpended balance of the amount heretofore appropriated for the relief of the captain, owners, officers, and crew of the late United States private armed brig General Armstrong, their heirs, executors, administrators, agents, or assigns, and make the following report thereon:

On May 1, 1882, Congress passed an act "authorizing and directing the Secretary of State to examine and adjust the claims of the captain, owners, officers, and crew of the late United States private brig General Armstrong, growing out of the destruction of said brig by a British force in the neutral port of Fayal in September, 1814, upon the evidence established before the Court of Claims, and to settle the same upon the principles of justice and equity."

Court of Claims, and to settle the same upon the principles of justice and equity."

On March 21, 1895, Congress passed another act entitled "An act making appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for prior years, and for other purposes," in which it is provided "that the unexpended balance made by the act of May 1, 1882, for the relief of the captain, owners, officers, and crew of the United States brig of war General Armstrong, their heirs, administrators, agents, or assigns, now under the control of the Department of State, shall be applied for the liquidation and settlement of the claim of Samuel C. Reid according to the vouchers now on file in said Department."

On the 3d of April, 1895, the Secretary of State submitted to the Solicitor-General the foregoing acts of 1882 and 1895, together with eighteen inclosures, asking the Solicitor-General to advise him as to what amount, if any, he was authorized to pay to Mr. Samuel C. Reid from the unexpended balance of the appropriation made by the said acts of 1882 and 1895.

Mr. HAWLEY. The Senate will have seen by this time that I was not unreasonable in making an inquiry as to what was done with the unexpended balance. It appears that the proper officer of the Attorney-General's Office was at one time opposed to disposing of the remainder, but he now thinks it quite equitable and just that Congress should make Mr. Reid a sort of residuary legatee of all that remains. Probably nobody will ever come, after this lapse of time, to claim a share of it. I find that the bill has had thorough consideration, and I make no further objection to it.

Mr. CULLOM. I have listened to the reading of the report, and I think it discloses the fact that the Government may hereafter be to acquire any portion of this sum for sixty years, I am not inclined to make any further opposition to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported an amendment, to strike out the preamble; which was agreed to.

JOHN N. QUACKENBUSH.

Mr. HOAR. I do not like to interfere with the regular order of the Calendar, but I ask the Senate to take up the bill (S. 3313) for the relief of John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the United States Navy. At the last session the bill passed both Houses, but it did not get to the President in time to receive the attention. It was called up the other day and was before the Senate, but went over temporarily on account of a suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Chandler], who now withdraws his opposition to the bill. I suppose it will not be necessary to read the bill except by title, as it was read at length the other day.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the President to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint John N. Quackenbush, late a commander in the Navy of the United States, to the same grade and rank of commander in the United States Navy as of the date of August 1, 1883, and to place him on the retired list of the Navy, as of the date of June 1, 1895. But he shall receive no nav or employments assent June 1, 1895. But he shall receive no pay or emoluments except from the date of such reappointment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed. ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be Mr. HALE. to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

OSCAR A. BULETTE.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 5407) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against Oscar A. Bulette, known in his military title as Austin Bulette, late private Company E, Fifty-second Illinois Infantry Volunteers, during the late war.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM B. ELLIS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2259) for the relief of William B. Ellis. The bill has been reported favorably by the Committee on Military Affairs, and proposes to correct the record of the soldier.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 4, after the words "directed to," to strike out all of the bill down to and including the word "date," in line 9, and insert in line the following. lieu thereof the following:

Revoke Special Field Orders, No. 194, from the Headquarters Department of the Cumberland, dated July 16, 1863, accepting the resignation of William B. Ellis, late captain of Company I, Seventy-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and discharging him from the service "for worthlessness as an officer," and then to accept said resignation and to issue to him an honorable discharge as of date July 16, 1863, and to correct his record accordingly.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to revoke Special Field Orders, No. 194, from the Headquarters Department of the Cumberland, dated July 16, 1863, accepting the resignation of William B. Ellis, late captain of Company I, Seventy-ninth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and discharging him from the service "for worthlessness as an officer," and then to accept said resignation and to issue to him an honorable discharge as of date July 16, 1863, and to correct his record accordingly: Provided, That no pay, bounty, pension, or other allowances shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM E. BOND.

Mr. PASCO. I ask unanimous consent that the first bill in order on the Calendar may now be considered. It is the bill (S. 2393) for the relief of William E. Bond.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the bill to be combined whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William E. Bond, of Edenton, Chowan County, N. C., $307.43. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3219) donating condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Wadsworth Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Helena, Mont.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. CARTER. I move to amend the bill by striking out the words "the Navy" in line 3 and inserting the word "War."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair).

The amendment will be stated.

The Secretary. In line 3 it is proposed to strike out the words "the Navy" and insert the word "War;" so as to read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is, directed to deliver to Wadsworth Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Helena, Mont., two condemned cannon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSHUA BISHOP.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us now proceed with the Calendar. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next case on the Calendar will be stated.

Will be stated.

The bill (S. 2338) for the relief of Joshua Bishop was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It confers on the Court of Claims jurisdiction to try and determine the claim of Joshua Bishop against the United States for pay alleged to be due and unpaid to him as lieutenant-commander of the Navy from February 9, 1999, 48 February 98, 1871

1868, to February 28, 1871.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH HATCHERY IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

The bill (S. 470) granting to the State of Washington certain lands therein situated for the purpose of a fish hatchery was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DONATION OF CONDEMNED CANNON.

Mr. LINDSAY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7777) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to furnish condemned cannon to Fort Thomas, Ky.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HILL. What is that fort? Is it a United States fort?

Mr. LINDSAY. It is a United States fort, a garrison, and regimental station.

Mr. HILL. The only point about it is that I was about to suggest to the Senator from Kentucky whether the case is not cov ered by the general bill which we have already passed, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War to give or loan to municipalities and various organizations condemned cannon. The reason why I ask him if it is not covered by that measure is because he speaks of it as Fort Thomas.

Mr. LINDSAY. I do not think it is covered by that measure. It is a United States fort, regimental station, and barracks.

Mr. HILL. I should suppose, then, that the Secretary of the Navy could do it at his discretion without any bill. I have no objection to the bill, however, unless it is covered by the general

PROPOSED INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next case on the Calendar will be stated.

The bill (H. R. 9188) authorizing the appointment of a nonpartisan commission to collate information and to consider recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PLATT. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut

asks that the bill shall be passed over.

Mr. PERKINS. This bill has been upon our Calendar since last June. We have been waiting anxiously to reach it, and it seems to me it should be disposed of at this time. It is a measure of great importance, I think, and it is entitled to the consideration of the Senate. It should either be passed or defeated. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will therefore permit the bill to be considered at this time, as we have reached it in its regMr. PLATT. The bill can not be considered under the five-tinute rule. The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the judgment of the Chair, the motion of the Senator from California is clearly in order.

the motion of the Senator from California is clearly in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from California, that the bill the title of which has been stated by the Secretary shall be made a special order for 2 o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I do not desire that the bill shall be made a special order so as to interfere with the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from South Dakota that the unfinished business takes precedence under the rule.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Very well.
Mr. PERKINS. To remove any possible objection, I will suggest Wednesday next at 2 o'clock.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California

Mr. CALL. I suggest to the Senator from California that the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations in relation to the independence of Cuba ought to receive the consideration of this body, and no order ought to be made providing for the consideration of any measure upon a particular day which would exclude the consideration of that resolution.

Mr. PERKINS. I am in deep sympathy in the abstract with the cause which my friend the Senator from Florida is advocating. This measure, however, is for our own people. It is in the interest of the people of this country, and I think we ought to do a little talking and perhaps some legislating for our own people as well as for the oppressed of Cuba and Armenia. Therefore, I shall insist upon my motion.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the bill can not be made a special order until it is brought before the Senate. The first thing to be done is to get the bill before the Senate. A motion to make a special order is not in order except when the bill is before the

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill is before the Senate.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Rhode Island that the bill was regularly reached in its place upon the Calendar, present consideration of the bill

Mr. ALDRICH. I object to the present consideration of the bill.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection has been made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].
Mr. ALDRICH. Then the bill has passed from the consideration of the Senate

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hardly agrees with the Senator from Rhode Island, the bill having been brought up, not subject to objection, but reached in its regular order upon the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Its present consideration was antagonized by the Senator from Connecticut. Then the Senator from California undertook to have it fixed as the special order for some future day, Mr. ALDRICH. But in order to do that he must first move to bill being up, he can move to make it a special order for a special day,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hardly agrees with the Senator from Rhode Island. If the bill had been called up or its consideration called for by any Senator, subject to objection to the request for unanimous consent, it would not have been before the Senate had objection been made. But the bill was before the Senate, having been reached in its regular order on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should be glad if the Chair would call the attention of the Senate to any rule on the subject.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that Rule VIII be read.

Mr. ALDRICH, Let Rule VIII be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is now proceeding under the rule to which the Senators refer. The Secretary will read the rule.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE VIII.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

At the conclusion of the morning business for each day, unless upon motion the Senate shall at any time otherwise order, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the Calendar of Bills and Resolutions, and continue such consideration until 2 o'clock; and bills and resolutions that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once and for five minutes only upon any question; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings, but upon motion the Senate may continue such consideration; and this order shall commence immediately after the call for "concurrent and other resolutions," and shall take precedence of the unfinished business and other special orders. But if the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of any matter notwithstanding an objection, the foregoing provisions touching debate shall not apply.

All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the Secretary

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will ask the Secretary to read the first section of Rule X. The Secretary read as follows:

RULE X.

SPECIAL ORDERS.

1. Any subject may, by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present, be made a special order; and when the time so fixed for its consideration arrives, the Presiding Officer shall lay it before the Senate unless there be unfinished business of the preceding day; and if it is not finally disposed of on that day, it shall take its place on the Calendar of Special Orders, in the order of time at which it was made special, unless it shall become by adjournment the unfinished business.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the two rules which have just to read show clearly that my contention in regard to this matter must be right. We are acting under Rule VIII. Under the provisions be right. We are acting under Rule VIII. Under the provisions of that rule, bills are in order subject to objection. If objected to, a bill goes over, retaining its place on the Calendar, unless a motion is made to take up the bill notwithstanding the objection. The moment the objection was made this bill passed from the consideration of the Senate, unless the Senator—

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Rhode Island allow me a moment?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly,
Mr. HILL. Does the Senator say that we have to take up the bill first before we can make a special order of it?

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly, in the morning hour, when we are proceeding under Rule VIII. If the motion was made after 3 o'clock or at some other time, a different rule might apply, but during the morning hour, up to 2 o'clock, when proceeding under Rule VIII, nothing is in order except unobjected cases or cases which have been taken up by a vote of the Senate notwithstanding the objection. ing the objection.

Mr. HILL. It strikes me that when the bill is reached it is duly reached to be disposed of in any proper way, except that its present consideration shall not be proceeded with; it is then before the Senate, and any other motion can be made that is pertinent to its disposition. Can not a motion then be made to refer it?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not at all, unless it was taken up.

Mr. HILL. To recommit it?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not unless the bill was before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas, Will the Senator from Rhode Island

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.
Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It seems to me the contention of the Senator from New York is absolutely indisputable from the language of Rule VIII. It says:

And the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings, but, upon motion, the Senate may continue such consideration.

Showing plainly that the language of the rule means that the bill has not gone from the consideration of the Senate by reason of the objection alone.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, when the objection is made, nothing is in order, it seems to me, except a motion to take up the bill notwithstanding the objection which was interposed to its take up the bill.

Mr. PLATT, Notwithstanding the objection,
Mr. ALDRICH. Notwithstanding the objection; and then the able might be made, and the time of the Senate might be taken up with the consideration of a bill when no vote at all had been taken upon the subject, notwithstanding the objection.

The object of the eighth rule was that unobjected cases on the Calendar which had received favorable report should be considered in the morning hour, or when objection did take place and the will of the Senate was the other way, that then the bill should be taken up notwithstanding the objection. A motion to make a special order is practically a motion to postpone the consideration to a fixed day, it occurs to me, and certainly we can not postpone the consideration of a bill unless the bill itself is before the Senate.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island is the chairman of the Committee on Rules and the author of many of them. I am charitable enough to believe that all of these many of them. I am charitable enough to believe that all of these rules were made for the purpose of expediting the business of the Senate and at the same time giving us an opportunity to express our views upon the pending question. We reached this measure on the Calendar in its regular order. The Senator from Connecticut said that the limited time of five minutes would not be sufficient for him to discuss the measure. Therefore, out of consideration for him, while the bill was before the Senate and in its possession, I moved to make it a special order for 2 o'clock next Wednesday. It seems to me that this course is in perfect accord with the rule. It seems to me that this course is in perfect accord with the rule read by the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair entertains no doubt about the proper decision of the question pending.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to have the bill read on which the motion is made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will first rule upon the point the Senator from Rhode Island has raised.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Chair to decide against it.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The only question between the Senator from Rhode Island and the Chair is as to whether the bill was before the Senate. It was reached in its regular order upon the Calendar. The Chair does not understand that Rule VIII takes away from the Senate the power to dispose of a bill except by present consideration reached in the morning hour under the operation of that rule. Objection being made to the present consideration of the bill, it went over, and that objection may, under the rule, be made at any time; but it did not take the bill, in the judgment of the Chair, from before the Senate. The Chair has no doubt that it was perfectly competent and in order for the Senator from California to move to make the bill, regularly reached in its order and before the Senate, a special order for any given time.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have no disposition to appeal from the decision of the Chair; but I would suggest, if that is a good ruling, that a motion to amend or any other motion which is pertinent to a bill may be made after a bill had been objected to and after, under objection, it had passed from the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks not, because the submission of an amendment would involve the consideration of the bill, but a motion to fix a day for its hearing does not involve its consideration at this time.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have great regard for the opinion of my predecessor upon the Committee on Rules, and therefore I will not appeal from the decision of the Chair; but I ask that the bill which it is proposed to make a special order may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill authorizing the appointment of a non-partisan commission to collate information and to consider and recommend legislation to meet the problems presented by labor, agriculture, and capital.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to appeal to the Senator from Rhode Island. I want him first to see that his plan is very transparent to anyone. The hour of 2 o'clock has about arrived, and the to anyone. The hour of 2 o'clock has about arrived, and the measure goes over. I want the Senate to vote upon the measure "aye" or "no," and, while he is opposed to it, let him beat it fairly. The bill I will read to him in private in his committee room after we adjourn, if he wishes to hear it; but I say it is unfair to take up the time of the Senate at this moment for the purpose of having it go over.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have a very shadowy idea about what the bill is a larger that in a general way it involves the expenditure.

bill is. I know that, in a general way, it involves the expenditure of two or three hundred thousand dollars a year at least, perhaps a half million, in what, according to my notion, is the most chimerical idea that was ever presented to the American Senate. I think it is rather desirable, in view of that fact, that the Senate should know something about the character of the bill which it is proposed to make a special order. I have never known a case where, at the request of a Senator or anybody else, a bill of importance was made a special order without being read. So, it strikes me that the criticism of the Senator from California is a little wide of the mark. I shall ask that the bill may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Whereas many of those engaged in the various fields of labor and also many of those engaged in agricultural pursuits are organized and, together with ings.

those engaged in commerce, are presenting grievances to Congress and to the various State governments, seeking and demanding legislation in their behalf: Now, therefore, in order to give a hearing and to meet the requirements of this large number of citizens,

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission, to be called the "Industrial Commission," composed as follows: Three men representative of labor, three men representative of agriculture, three men representative of labor, three men representative of agriculture, three men representative of business. A majority of this commission shall not belong to any one of the political parties which took part in the last Presidential election. The President shall have the power to remove any member of said commission for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or malfeasance, or for any other reason duly set forth.

SEC. 2. That each division of three shall have the right to employ one legal adviser, whose compensation shall be the same as hereinafter provided for a member of the commission, and one secretary, at a salary of $200 per month. The commission shall convene in the city of Washington, D. C. within sixty days after its appointment, and shall organize by the selection of one of its members as president, who shall designate from time to time one of the secretaries provided for in this section to act as secretary of the commission. The president and officers shall be chosen by a majority vote of the commission and may be removed from office at any time by a vote of two-thirds of the commission; the president shall serve for such term as the commission may determine; a majority of the commission shall determine the composition of its standing committees and their duties, and shall appoint any subcommissions that may be required as provided for in section 5, and commission may determine; a majority of the commission. The commission shall be the duty of this commission to investigate questions pertaini

I caused the bill to be read because I believe that when its extraordinary provisions become apparent to the Senate it will never vote to make it a special order. in the Senate some sixteen years, and it is certainly the most extraordinary proposition that has ever been presented to this body by any standing committee. I should like to call attention, very briefly, to some of its provisions. It provides for the appointment of a commission of fifteen, as I remember it.

Mr. PERKINS. Twelve.
Mr. ALDRICH. A commission of twelve, at a salary of $5,000 a year. To do what? To do the very things that Congress is elected to do; that is, to suggest legislation for the benefit of the people of the United States. These gentlemen are to be divided into subdivisions, and each one of the subdivisions is to employ an interest of the confidence of the subdivisions is to employ an interest of the confidence of the subdivisions is to employ an interest of the confidence of the subdivisions is to employ an interest of the confidence of the subdivisions is to employ an interest of the confidence of the subdivisions is to employ an interest of the confidence of the subdivisions is to employ an interest of the confidence of th attorney at a salary of $5,000 a year (if I am correct, and I think I am), making sixteen men in all to be appointed as a commission at a salary of $5,000 a year, to consider questions of legislation. In addition to these salaries the expenses of the commission are to be paid. They are authorized to employ clerks and employees of all kinds to aid them in their work.

I do not desire to say anything or to do anything that my friend from California will consider unkind, but I do say that there is not a member of the Senate, in my opinion, who will carefully consider the measure and agree to vote for the bill at all, to say nothing about making it a special order at any time.

Mr. PERKINS. There were but 2 votes against it in the House of Representatives.

FREE HOMESTEADS IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3656) providing for free homesteads on the public lands in Oklahoma Territory for actual and bona fide settlers, and reserving the public lands for that purpose, the pending question being on the first amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. Pl. ATT. Mr. President I do not wish to detain the Senate

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate long with reference to the bill now under consideration.

The objections which I have to the bill were embodied in the views which I submitted as a member of the committee and were read upon the consideration of the bill yesterday. Perhaps I might leave the whole subject there if it were not that some of the suggestions which were made by the Senators advocating the passage of the bill seem to require some explanation and some

The question is a simple and at the same time an important one. It is a single issue, and is this: Congress has adopted the policy, when extinguishing the Indian title and the opening to settlement of lands in the reservations, that the Government shall be reim-bursed for the amount which it may pay to extinguish the Indian

Congress has been acting on that policy certainly since 1889, and whenever it has made an agreement with the Indians by which it purchased from them a portion of their reservation or paid to them sums of money for the purpose of procuring from them the extin-guishment of their title it has provided in the act by which they were opened to settlement that persons settling upon those lands should settle under the homestead laws and in addition should pay a sum per acre for the lands which would be equivalent to what the Government had been called upon to pay the Indians.

Under this policy about 35,000,000 acres of land have been bought from Indians, taken out from the Indian reservations, and opened to settlement. I say bought from the Indians, for that is practically what has been done. The Indians have been paid to relinquish their titles to the lands, and in every instance a sum per acre has been fixed in the act providing for the opening of the lands to settlement which the settler was to pay.

For seven or eight years Congress has recognized this policy, has acted upon it, and during the whole time there has not been a suggestion from any quarter in the United States that that was not what the Government ought to do. The people who are now asking that the Government shall release to the settlers the sum which they were to pay at the end of their five years' homestead occupa-tion have seen all these acts pass in Congress, have known the principle upon which they were framed—I may say have urged the passage of these bills in Congress knowing the principle upon which the bills were framed—and have never suggested that it was not what the Government ought to do.

It is very strange, Mr. President, that now it should all at once be discovered that Congress has been acting upon an entirely wrong principle during these seven or eight years, that it has been perpetrating a great wrong upon the people who desired to settle upon the public lands, a wrong which ought to be remedied even at a great expense to the Government. It seems to me that the statement which I have made, which will not be contradicted, which can not be contradicted, ought to be decisive of this question. I might go further.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me at that point?

Mr. PLATT.

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.
Mr. ALLEN. So far as the settlers upon Indian lands in my State are concerned, they have protested against the Government exacting $2.50 an acre out of them for the last five or six years; in fact, since the Great Sioux Reservation was opened to settlement. But in this connection, if the Senator will permit me, there is some pride in American citizenship. The people who occupy these lands have desired, if they could, by economy and industry, to pay for them, but the condition of the seasons and the climate has been such as to render it absolutely futile for them to attempt to do so. Knowing that fact, they now come here and ask the Government to resume the policy of free homesteads.

Mr. PLATT. Well, Mr. President, I think I will touch upon all those subjects. It has been my fortune to be a member either of the Territorial Committee or of the Indian Committee of the Senate during all the period covered by the passage of such acts. I was a member of both committees at the time the bill for the opening of the Great Sioux Reservation was passed. I can state of my own knowledge that the importunities of the people who desired the opening of that reservation were coupled with a promise that the settlers should pay a sum sufficient to reimburse the Government, or a sum which should be fixed by the Government, for the ment, or a sum which should be fixed by the Government, for the benefit of the Indians. There was no objection to it, but it was conceded that it was right that it should be so done.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What case was that?

Mr. PLATT. The Great Sioux Reservation. I remember all about the opening of that reservation. This question does not range around the Great Sioux Reservation particularly, Mr. President as I shell show; but were after were the committees of the dent, as I shall show; but year after year the committees of the dent, as I shall show; but year after year the committees of the Senate were persistently urged to open that reservation in the interest of the people who wanted to settle upon it, and then it was represented to be the very garden of the earth. The policy of the Government in allowing such fertile, rich land to remain in the possession of the Indians when white settlers were anxious to take it and pay for it a fair price was denounced. Oh, no, Mr. President, I know all about the opening of these Indian reservations. I know all about the passage of these bills.

Right here, perhaps, I might as well allude to a suggestion which was made yesterday by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Pettigrew] that the objection to the passage of the pending bill came from the East, although he did not use the word "East," but that section of the country where the wealth is. Now, Mr. President, that was hardly kind. I think that as an Eastern Senator I have, perhaps, been as liberal to Western sentiment as any Western Senator. There are six States in the West not very largely populated, and about the admission of which has been directed toward me, and I think perhaps it is safe to say I had as much to de with the herican intertact. toward me, and I think perhaps it is safe to say I had as much to do with the bringing into the Union those States as any one Senator, an action which I do not feel called upon to defend, an action which I would take again, because I believe in the admission of the same sion as a State of any Territory which comes to that condition where it has a self-supporting, a free, and a prosperous people. But I am not to be charged with prejudice against the West, and I think that my conduct here in the Senate may certainly be appealed to to exonerate me from any such charge.

I was going on to say that during all the time when these lands were being opened for settlement, during all the time when Congress was being important and the given the white nearly appeared to give the white nearly appeared to give the white gress was being importuned to give the white people an opportunity to go upon them, there has never been heard, so far as I know, an objection that there was anything wrong in the policy of requiring the settlers to pay a sufficient sum of money to reimburse the Government. I might go to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and show that over and over again, when these bills have been under consideration, Senators and Representatives advocating them have referred to the fact that the Government was to be reimbursed by payment from the settlers for its expenditure in extinguishing the Indian title.

guishing the Indian title.

So this thing has not been done in a corner, Mr. President. Now the objection is made—and it is a plausible claim and a plausible objection—that the principles of the homestead act should apply to the settlement of these lands. If that had been urged when the lands were being opened, when the people were clamoring for opportunity to settle upon these lands, it would have been a very different question from what it is now. Even then I do not think that the application of the principle which underlies the homestead act would have been proper; but now, when these bills have been passed, and passed without the sugges-tion that these lands ought to be opened under the homestead law without any payment on the part of the settlers, it seems to me that as to these lands the case ought to be considered closed. If in the future opening of Indian reservations and extinguishment of Indian titles Congress shall be asked to adopt a different policy and go back to the homestead law, under which it is desired that the lands shall be settled and that the Government shall pay these large sums of money which it has to pay for the extinguishment of the Indian title and then donate the land, the question would then fairly come up. It would be naturally and properly an issue as to whether such lands should be settled under the homestead as to whether such lands should be settled under the homestead act; but if there be a possibility of anybody being stopped by conduct in a case before Congress, the Senators and Representatives who desired these lands to be opened in this way, the settlers, "boomers," as they were called, who desired them to be opened, and desired to settle upon them under this understanding, ought to be considered as estopped, for their line of conduct, their action, has been such as to induce the Government to an expenditure of over $30,000,000 which it otherwise would not have made. At least I think I am fairly entitled to say that the Government would never have made this expenditure if it had not been with the understanding that the settlers were to reimburse the Government.

Take the opening of the Cherokee Outlet. Senators know how

Take the opening of the Cherokee Outlet. Senators know how long that matter was pending before the Senate and how much objection there was to it. It was $8,000,000 the Government paid—or about that—to the Cherokee Nation for the extinguishment of their title in the Cherokee Outlet, and for the lands when settled there was to be paid at the end of five years' occupation, under the homestead act, for the eastern portion of the land, $2.50 an acre, for the middle portion $1.50, and for the western portion $1, according to the value of the land. Does anybody suppose that Congress would have expended that $8,000,000, have run in debt for it and made a future subsisting obligation, which must be paid, if it had not been understood that the Government was to be reimbursed? In the discussions here in Congress the fact was alluded to that the Government, paying down a portion only, and luded to that the Government, paying down a portion only, and agreeing to pay interest on the rest, had to wait until the end of five years before it received anything in the way of reimbursement, and then was not to be reimbursed for the interest. It was made a ground of objection to the legislation in the Senate that the Government was not going to be reimbursed for the interest which it would have to pay on $8,000,000 for five years, quite a large sum. I think I may say the same with reference to every large sum. I think I may say the same with large sum. I think I may say the same with one of these reservations.

Take the very last reservation, or almost the last one, the Nez Perces Reservation, where the agricultural lands were settled upon, and the settlers promised to pay $3.75 per acre, and where the act was only passed and the President's proclamation opened the lands for settlement in 1895. Is it supposed that we would have negotiated with those Indians and paid them a price which was equivalent to $3.75 an acre for their lands—this desert, arid land that is talked about—if it had not been understood that the Government was to be reimbursed? There were settlers there who were quite ready to take those lands at $3.75 an acre, as there were in Oklahoma in relation to the Cherokee Outlet.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Bacon in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. PLATT. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTIGREW. The Senator says there were settlers there ready to take those lands. Who were the settlers who were ready to take the lands? The people of those Territories and States all the settlers who were ready to take the lands?

Mr. PLATT. I do not know where they came from, but I think that within a year's time two-thirds of the agricultural lands of that Indian reservation had been entered for settlement.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PLATT. Yes, sir.
Mr. ALLEN. I only wanted to call the attention of the Senator from Connecticut to the Republican platform of 1896 on this

Mr. PLATT. Do not undertake to break me up in that way. If it is anything about the Nez Perces, I shall yield.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator permit me to read it in this connection?

Mr. PLATT. It was read yesterday, and it has been alluded to several times since this matter was before the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. It is as follows:

We believe in an immediate return to the free-homestead policy of the Republican party, and urge the passage by Congress of a satisfactory free-homestead measure—

Referring to this identical bill.

Mr. PLATT. If I am accused of violating any portion of the Republican platform, I prefer the accusation shall come from a member of my own party, rather than from members of other

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it is barely possible that a member of another party might be in a Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it position to judge whether a Republican is living up to the faith of his party, or whether the platform was simply promulgated to

Mr. PLATT. I may as well say one word on that subject, and I hope I may be able to get back to the Nez Perces Reservation, which I shall keep carefully in one corner of my brain while I am talking about another matter.

We all understand how matters creep into national platforms; and I venture to say that when that resolution and that platform was adopted there were not fifty delegates in the St. Louis convention who paid any attention to it or knew what it was about, or had any idea of what it involved.

Mr. ALLEN. But are they not bound by it?

Mr. PLATT. Iam not; and I think that before we get through the discussions of this Congress I shall be able to refer to some planks or resolutions in some of the Populist platforms, or the platforms of the party with which the Senator from Nebraska has acted since he broke into national politics, which he scarcely would feel like saying he was bound by.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I think, if the Senator will permit me, there is nothing in the Populist platform of 1892 that I do not fully agree with, except the subtreasury plan, which I have openly denounced from the time it was adopted, and which is not now a part of the Populist faith, but there is nothing in the platform of 1896 that I do not accept from the opening to the closing words and I shall be glid to have the Senator from Connections. words, and I shall be glad to have the Senator from Connecticut point out any defect in it.

Mr. PLATT. Well, Mr. President, I shall try to talk about the pending bill, which has been given the name of a free-homestead

Mr. TELLER. I should like to make one suggestion to the Senator from Connecticut, if he will allow me.

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I understand the Senator seems to think that the convention did not understand what was in the platform. I should like to say to him that this provision in the platform was put in by a subcommittee, reported to the whole committee, and reported by the whole committee to the convention, and read with the other provisions of the platform.

Mr. PLATT. Oh, I have no doubt about that, Mr. President.
I have no right to comment on what happened on the passage of this bill through the House of Representatives; but I venture to say that when it was made a special order in the Senate not half the Senators had an idea of what the bill involved, or what it was, or what the principle of it was. It is easy to get resolutions passed in convention, and it is easy to get the consideration of bills. That binds nobody

Now, about the Nez Perces Reservation, the price was $3.75 er acre. I am asked where the settlers came from. I do not per acre. I simply know upon information that since we passed that law within a year's time people have been found to take up at least half of the agricultural lands in that reservation upon the understood agreement that they were to pay $3.75 an acre for those lands; and when it came to the opening of the Cherokee Outlet, men who had been all over that Outlet, and who had looked at the land and knew the section number of any particular tract, who had been familiar for months and years with those lands, encamped on the border weeks and months for the sake of rushing in and selecting the best lands in the Outlet. They had fleet horses on which to race to those lands. They stole into the Outlet by every possible means. We were told here in the Senate that there were lands there worth $50 an acre, and these people knew perfectly well that upon whatever quarter section of land they located there was to be a payment made to the Government. I am one of the last men in the world, Mr. President, to be without sympathy for the "hardy pioneer." I think I have probably as much sympathy for the hardy pioneer as some of the people who live nearer to him. At least we are told in the argument here that if the sum which these settlers agreed to pay is not re-linquished to these men, there will be men right on the ground who will be glad to get the lands. I have a good deal of sympathy and great respect for the men who have struggled with the wilderness; but they were not all homestead settlers who went into the Cherokee Outlet, and they are not all honest homestead settlers who are there to-day. I received a letter this morning from a gentleman who has been quite prominent in Oklahoma, who describes the opening. I shall not give his name, because he desires to have it withheld. He says:

The "runs," when the land was opened, are matters of familiar history. There were four or five claimants for every three claims available. Men evidently wanted the land for something, for they fought over it like tigers, sacrificed many lives, and spent thousands of dollars in litigation, well knowing the terms under which alone the property could be acquired, and apparently satisfied therewith. But, as a whole, it was and still is a speculative movement. The number of real home seekers out there is comparatively small. A great majority of the occupants are adventurers and ne er-do-weels, willing and anxious to sell their claims for a song and then move on. I spent a good deal of time in traveling over the country investigating the actual condition, antecedents, and real purposes of the so-called settlers. Very few were really attempting to make homes; those few seemed to think they had a hard bargain, but understood their obligations, offered no complaint, and were inclined to make the best of it. The condition of many was pitiable, and would naturally arouse one's sympathy. But they are not the kind of people to be benefited by homestead gifts. A remittal of the obligations under which they now hold Oklahoma lands would simply add to the unrest and speculative tendency of the whole Territory. And this at the expense of actual home makers, farm owners, and taxpayers all over the country, who have a right to vigorously protest.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator tell us who is his authority? Mr. PLATT. I said I could not give the name because the gentltman asked me to withhold it. I wish I could give it.

Mr. PETTIGREW. Then it is anonymous.

Mr. TELLER. 1 was not here when the Senator from Connecticut made that statement.
Mr. ALLEN. Does the writer live in Oklahoma?
Mr. PLATT. He has been in Oklahoma, but he is not there

Mr. President, Oklahoma is not a desert. People will stay in Oklahoma even if those men who have said that they would pay the Government or assumed an obligation to pay the Government in order to get the land should be required to keep their contract; but I want here to defend Oklahoma a little against the aspersions which it seems to me are by implication put upon her.

We shall be called pretty soon to act upon the proposition to admit Oklahoma as a State. We shall be told that it has all the admit Oklahoma as a State. We shall be told that it has all the population and the wealth and the ability to support itself that a State should have when it comes into the Union. That argument has been made for the last three or four years, and a glowing picture has been drawn of the wealth, the resources, and the prospective future of Oklahoma, and it will be again. Scenes change according to what is wanted. When men wanted to get lands to which the Indians had the title, the lands were fertile; they were like the Garden of Eden; they were the best lands in the United States, it was said. Now, when they do not want to pay for the States, it was said. Now, when they do not want to pay for the lands, nobody can live on them, and it is very doubtful whether anybody will continue to live on them even if the Government relinquishes to them what they agreed to pay. That is true with reference to the opening of all of these reservations. reference to the opening of all of these reservations. I do not mean to say that there has been any false pretense about it. The imagination of Senators and Representatives who urged the opening of these lands was probably excited, and the vision of land that happened for the time being to be in possession of the Indians dazzled them; anything that the Indian had the white man ought to have, and so undoubtedly the lands were esteemed to be received to the property when the property were selected to the property when the property were selected. somewhat more valuable, more fertile, more desirable, and more to be coveted than there was really any occasion for. But Oklahoma will not perish, Mr. President, even if its citizens should be required to cancel their obligations to the Government in order to retain their land.

After hearing about it yesterday and getting the idea that a very large proportion of the settlers in Oklahoma were living in dugouts and sod houses and that they would be obliged to abandon their lands, it occurred to me that I would get the report of the governor of Oklahoma to see what he said about it. He makes report to the Secretary of the Interior, and made one up to June, 1896. The astonishing thing about it is that never in his report is it suggested that the Government ought to relinquish what is is it suggested that the Government ought to reiniquish what is to be paid to it by the settlers under the homestead act and the other acts which have been passed for the opening of this Territory. If there was the destitution, if there was the misery, the hardship, the chattel mortgage covering every piece of furniture and every pig in the Territory that we were told about yesterday, is it possible to conceive that the governor of the Territory would not have suggested that the people might properly and ought to be relieved from this burden which they were under, which they had yountarily assumed?

had voluntarily assumed?

Mr. President, if there were nothing else required to show that the passage of this bill is not a necessity, is not called for, it would be the fact that the governor of Oklahoma in his report to the Secretary of the Interior does not allude to any distress there. I had an idea that Oklahoma was quite a nice place, and so I got the report of the governor, and I am going to read something from it. He says:

The development of the Territory in the year past has been equal to if not greater than that of other portions of the United States.

In this "arid" belt, inclosed with blue lines, with which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. Pettigrew] disfigured the map, where the rainfall is so scant-

The development of the Territory in the year past has been equal to if not greater than that of other portions of the United States.

Nowhere has the year past been one marked for material progress. Oklahoma has, however, held its own and made some progress.

It has done better than other places.

The acreage of land in cultivation has steadily increased, and has very nearly eached the proper ratio of farm land to pasture.

Not quite yet.

The prospect for crops is good.

To listen to the debate yesterday you would not suppose there had been any crops in Oklahoma in the last three years. Perhaps there were not. There is nothing said about that in this report of the governor, but he says the prospect is good.

The prospect for crops is good, and the antebellum declaration, "Cotton is king," seems applicable to Oklahoma. Oklahoma will shortly rank among the cotton States of the Union. The quality of the cotton, as shown by the World's Fair awards, is the best. Unless the present indications fail, the present cotton crop of Oklahoma will be by far the greatest ever gathered, and I predict for the coming year one of genuine prosperity.

Even to those sadly misused people whom the Government expects to pay for the lands which they settled upon according to the terms upon which settlement was made.

The climate is delightful, except for a short period in midsummer. The spring, fall, and winter weather can not be excelled anywhere. The atmosphere is dry, but never sultry. The Territory is gaining considerable notoriety as a health resort for all persons affected with throat and lung troubles, or rheumatism, and all kindred diseases. Many wonderful cures have been effected. The growth of the Territory is solid and substantial, because it arises from the development of natural resources, and is not due to borrowed capital to be paid back in future with interest added.

Mr. President, you would suppose, for we heard it said here, that there was not a homestead settler in Oklahoma who had not mortgaged his property, not to some Eastern shark, but to some other Oklahoma man.

About the people of the Territory the governor says:

The people of the Territory are largely American by birth. Perhaps in few States are they more distinctly so. They are thrifty, industrious, and economical. There are many difficulties and discouragements connected with settling in a new country and tilling the virgin soil, but the entire people of Oklahoma glory in the triumph they have achieved.

I began to think when I listened to the reasons which were given for the passage of this bill yesterday that the people must be fleeing from the Territory as it was said they had fled from western Kansas and Nebraska. But no; the population is increasing. The governor says:

The population has steadily increased since the last census, in 1894, when it was 212,625. According to the returns made by the assessors for the year 1895, the population is now 275,587.

There is an increasing population and an increasing development of wealth, the governor says. Here is the population by counties; here is the taxable property by counties: For 1894 they had taxable property of about $20,000,000. In 1896 it had increased to over $24,000,000—almost $25,000,000—which the governor says is a very low estimate. He says:

This is very much under the true value of the property, but for the reason stated the board permitted it to stand.

They had some crooked work, the governor says, about the taxation in the year 1895, when it jumped from about $20,000,000 to about $40,000,000, and then was reduced in 1896 to about $25,000,000. He states why it was done, but I want to go on with what the governor says about Oklahoma.

There has been a steady and healthy increase in taxable property since the beginning, and the next few years will witness a very decided increase in the property of the Territory, both real and personal.

Even though the Government should be paid by these people who have taken up the lands upon an understanding that they were to pay for them.

The work of proving up has begun, and when patents for all the homesteads have been issued there will be a vastly increased showing in taxable property.

He does not intimate that there ought to be anything donated to the people of Oklahoma. They have banks down in Oklahoma, too. They have these wicked bankers. I do not think they are all from They have these wicked bankers. I do not think they are all 11000 the East, either. You would not suppose from what has been stated here that there was any occasion for a bank in Oklahoma; not a homestead settler in all Oklahoma able to pay this $2.50 or $1.50 or $1.25 or $1 to save his farm! One would scarcely suppose there would be any banks there, but the governor says there are fifty-two banks in the Territory of Oklahoma.

He asked them to report, and only eighteen of them did. He had not any power to compel them to report. But he has given here, in case of those reported, the loans and discounts and all the items which are usually given. He says:

I observe that there is a very considerable decrease in deposits in the last

I observe that there is a very considerable decrease in deposits in the last year, and an actual increase in the amount of cash on hand. There is a decrease in the amount of securities held and also in loans and discounts.

The loans and discounts are $519,000—the stocks, bonds, warrants, etc. I will not give the items.

It seems, Mr. President, that, according to the ideas of Senators, there was great misapprehension in the minds of the people about Oklahoma, to which the settlers went, and we are told now that if the Government insists upon payment for these lands the men will simply abandon them, and they will be gobbled up for cattle grazing. If the Government will let the people have the lands for nothing, Senators think they will manage in some way or another to stay on them; and they probably will. But according to the idea of Senators who desire to have this debt given to the people who owe it, if that is not done the people will relinquish their homes. Oklahoma, instead of struggling with agriculture, will relapse into a cattle-grazing country. I suppose it is Oklahoma—all these lands—for Senators class them all together. The governor has something to say about agriculture:

Agriculture comprises such a wide scope that as brief a report as this furnishes a meager synopsis of the great agricultural interests of the Territory. There is a great diversity in the crops of the Territory. Wheat, Indian corn, cotton, castor beans, kaffir corn, oats, barley, saccharine, sorghum, and the great forage plants, alfalfa, clover, and timothy, in the eastern and central portions of the Territory are the principal products. Horticulture, with its concemitants, within the short period of a little more than six years, rivals any of the States in the Union.

Famine-stricken, poverty-stricken Territory! The says horticulture rivals that of any State in the Union. The governor

One and one-half million fruit trees have been planted; several millions of smaller fruits have found a home to stay, and are thriving under our peculiar climatic influences. It is not claiming too much to say that the Oklahoma peach has found its way into nearly all of the markets of the western world. It is recognized by the rich red cheek and the excellent flavor it possesses. The Oklahoma watermelon and muskmelon are in demand in the principal markets. One small station alone shipped during the summer of 1895 about 100 carloads of this delicious fruit, which bids fair to be exceeded in 1896. Potato culture is of no mean importance and should not be lost sight of, as it, too, is of great commercial value. One hundred carloads of sweet potatoes is a low estimate of the surplus.

In this arid region which can not be farmed!

It has been said that the best stock country that can be found is the best grain country.

I am quoting from the governor of Oklahoma. An Eastern man is not expected to know much of his own knowledge about Okla-homa. I have been there several times, and I confess that I never saw finer looking agricultural lands in any portion of this country over which I have traveled than I saw in Oklahoma. I confess that I am not to be expected to know much about agricultural lands, and being an Eastern man, I might, in the estimation of the people in Oklahoma who wish to be relieved from the payment of their obligations, be supposed to be prejudiced, and so I quote on them their own governor.

It has been said that the best stock country that can be found is the best grain country. It this be true, Oklahoma carries the banner.

Think of that, Mr. President! This bill passed the House of Representatives for Oklahoma alone. It has been threefolded since it came here, and yet its governor says that Oklahoma carries the banner as a stock and grain country.

A conservative estimate gives Oklahoma for the year 1896, 50,000,000 bushels of indian corn, and more than half that amount of kaffir corn, to say nothing of the great wheat, oat, and barley crops.

What are we to believe about the matter? We have extended the time of payment two years on account of drought, and the people of that country have had my earnest and sincere sympathy, because I have supposed that for two or three successive years they have suffered from serious drought. But here comes the governor and says that a conservative estimate gives Oklahoma for the year 1896, 50,000,000 bushels of indian corn, and so on, with the year 1896, 50,000,000 bushels of indian corn, and so on, with regard to the other great crops.

Mr. PETTIGREW. What is the date of the report?

Mr. PLATT. It is the report for the year ending June 30, 1896. It is not dated, so far as I know.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to say to the Senator, then, that on June 30 the governor stated what the crop was going to be. It appears they had no crop for the two prior years.

Mr. PLATT. The governor does not say anything about that.

Mr. PETTIGREW. He estimates what the crop is going to be. The report is dated in June and the harvest is in September.

Mr. PLATT. I think I am equal in my knowledge to that of

Mr. PLATT. I think I am equal in my knowledge to that of the Senator from South Dakota when I say that they harvest corn in the Indian Territory before September. I am quite sure of that. There is a great deal more good reading here. Here is a paragraph about cotton:

Cotton, castor beans, flax, and peanuts are the great money-makers, thought that the weather for the last few weeks has been too humid—

Not arid, humid-

but with the sunny days that are to follow Oklahoma will market the greatest crop of cotton and castor beans ever produced.

Even if the Government does not relinquish.

The cotton is of excellent quality, the best in fact, as shown by the awards at the World's Fair at Chicago. There is no higher tribute to the excellence of Oklahoma agricultural products than that paid by the awards at that great fair, where were collected the products of all nations.

This terrible arid region, these desert lands, where, if the persons who have settled there are, after seven years of settlement, required to pay an average of $1.50 an acre, they are going to abandon their farms and go no one knows where.

Never were the prospects for cotton better than at present, and there is every reason to believe that Oklahoma will make a creditable showing in the list of cotton-producing States or Territories.

Guthrie, it is estimated, will market 12,000 bales, while Oklahoma City, Shawnee, and Norman will each market nearly that much.

There is every reason to believe that the ruling prices will be from 7 to 8 cents per pound.

He is a little of the control of th

He is a little short in his guesswork on that point.

Mr. STEWART. A little long.
Mr. PLATT. Well, long. I am not familiar with the terms "long" and "short." I believe that cotton is worth about 7 cents a pound. So the governor got pretty near it.

The average crop will be one-half bale per acre. This places the value of the crop at from $17.50 to $20 per acre.

If they are economical on one of these cotton-homestead farms and can get a cotton crop off it worth $17 to $20 an acre it would seem that in seven years they would be able to save enough money to pay $1.50 an acre for their lands.

The principal cost in raising cotton is the picking, which, if the farmer can not do it all himself, he can have it done at about 50 cents per 100 pounds. At this busy season the farmer often calls the whole family to his assistance, the work being of such a character that any person can do it, though some work much faster than others. It is simply wonderful how much money this article brings into the country.

It would not be anything very hard, since money is flowing into that country in this wonderful way, according to the governor, if after a year or two more of extension we should ask the men who are getting cotton crops at the rate of $20 an acre to pay up a little something which they have agreed to pay.

A conservative estimate, given me by a farmer from a township east of this point, places the acreage of cotton in that township at 8,000, with a probable average yield of one-half bale, which would mean $148,000 for that township alone.

Then he goes on to speak about native grasses, about fruit growing, the natural adaptation of Oklahoma to stock raising, etc. But here is something. I do not know that I ought to read it.

Water is everywhere abundant.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS, In the arid region. Mr. PLATT. The governor continues:

Water is everywhere abundant, and even salt is distributed up and down such rivers as the Salt Fork, Cimarron, and Canadian.

Mr. STEWART. Did the Senator from Connecticut vote for the appropriation to examine that country with a view to ascertaining the possibility of irrigation by artesian wells?

Mr. PLATT. I think that I struggled as well as I could in my humble way to create a committee on irrigation and to have the Senator from Nevada appointed its chairman, but I never before heard that the arid belt which would require irrigation extended into Oklahoma

Mr. STEWART. It certainly does.
Mr. PLATT. The governor says otherwise.
Mr. STEWART. I do not know what he says. Mr. PLATT. The governor says further:

There are fertile valleys where corn, kaffir corn, and other grain may be raised in abundance. While the western portion of the Territory seems specially adapted and endowed by nature for cattle raising, the eastern portion is equally well adapted to raising hogs, and the people of that section have not been slow to recognize that fact,

Mr. President, I do not think this is an overdrawn picture on the part of the governor of Oklahoma, but it is a wonderful commentary on the pictures of that Territory which were drawn here

Now, the pending bill as it passed the other House applied only to Oklahoma Territory. I wish we had the reports of the governors of the States, for I should like to read them. I should like to read the report of the governor of the State of South Dakota or the governor of Montana or the governor of any of those States, and put it alongside the sad picture that was drawn here yesterday. I do not know how they would compare. I know how the report of the governor of Oklahoma compares with the picture painted here, even the picture which was exhibited, the map picture of the arid region where rainfall was scarce and crops could not be raised and the land was adapted only to stock raising.

As I say, when the bill came over here of course every Senator who saw that the other House had passed a bill donating to the settlers in Oklahoma the amount which they had expected to pay for their lands, and without paying which they could not get their lands, wanted to have the same principle applied to reservations in their States, and I do not blame them at all. If it is going to be done in Oklahoma it ought to be done in South Dakota, and it ought to be done everywhere.

to be done everywhere.

Now, to allude for a moment to another side of this case, I will state that the amount of money involved is perhaps not the strongest objection which can be urged to the passage of the pending bill. The committee differs with the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs as to how much will be relinquished by the Government, and the committee differs with itself. When it made its report, it thought the Government might lose $17,500,000 by it. Yesterday when the chairman of the committee made his argument here, as I remember it—I have it before me, but I have not the opportunity to refer to it—he thought that the loss to the Government by giving to the settlers on the agricultural lands what they had expected to pay for the lands could not amount to more than two or three million dollars, and five or six million dollars, as I remember it, for the mineral lands. He reduced his estimates from his written report about one-half. He reduced them in the written report one-half from the report of the Secretary of the Interior, and then in his speech he reduced them one-half below what was put in the report. I say perhaps that is not the greatest thing to be looked at. The Senator from South Dakota thought that was really the principal trouble in my mind, that the Government could not afford it, and therefore it must go into the business of "wringing" millions from these poor people. I think it is of a good deal more importance for the people to learn to keep their bargains in this world and to abide by them. I think it is of a good deal more importance whether the people of the United States are going to be encouraged in the idea that when things do not go as they want them to go individually they have a right to ask the Government to make them satisfactory, for that is what is back of this bill. tory, for that is what is back of this bill.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] this morn-

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] this morning, in discussing some question here, spoke, as I suppose, somewhat jocosely about the paternalistic power in the Constitution of the United States. I do not believe it is there.

I am not going to quarrel with the homestead law; I think the country has derived great advantages and great benefits from it. But if it has fixed in the minds of the people of the country the idea that when things go a little hard with them, when they are not making as much money as they wish to make, when they are they ought to be better off than they are, they can come to the Government and have it righted, it will have damaged the country and the Government and the future of the Government more than enough to offset all its benefits and advantages. That is just what the pending bill does

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me?
Mr. PLATT. Certainly.
Mr. ALLEN. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Connecticut. The people to whom he refers have no desire whatever to escape the consequences of any legal contract they have made or may make. It occurs to me that the Senator from Connecticut has entirely a misconception of their purposes. ple question, and it reduces itself to that, is this: Are these people, or can they be, in a condition to pay their obligations to the Government? The Government must either relinquish these lands to those people under the general homestead act or it must resume control of the lands again and use them for purely pastoral purcontrol of the lands again and use them for purely pastoral purposes. That is all there is to that. The Government will not lose one cent by giving these lands to the people, because it can not make any money out of the lands in any form. If the settlers have the land, the potential power that they possess and the wealth they will be able to produce eventually will be a hundredfold more than what the Government relinquishes to them.

M. D. ATT. Mr. President this is your strange. That lock

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, this is very strange. Just look at it for a moment. I do not overstate this matter when I state that every representation made to Congress on the opening of these lands was that they were fertile. Now, they are not adapted to agriculture, they are not fitted for agriculture, and therefore the Government should relinquish them to the homestead settlers. If the Government does not relinquish, the lands are going to be given up. If the Government does relinquish, the settlers are going on to "produce wealth a hundredfold." I think I use the exact language of the Senator from Nebraska. Look on this picture, then on that.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will permit me—I do not like unnecessarily to disturb him—I will state that the deductions made by him are absurd in the light of facts. These lands are fertile.

Many of them are as fertile lands as can be found between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans, but in consequence of a lack of sufficient rainfall they will not produce anything more than grasses in the spring that will support cattle. It is not the fault of the quality of the land. It is the fault of nature in not precipitating enough rainfall to produce moisture sufficient to mature crops. The Senators who said these lands were among the most fertile in the United States were correct in their statements, and it is unwarranted to draw the conclusion that there was any misrepresentation in a statement of that kind.

Mr. PLATT. It was not only represented that they were the most fertile lands in the United States, but that the people were very anxious to get upon them for agricultural purposes, not for grazing purposes. As I remarked some time ago, it makes a good grazing purposes. As I remarked some time ago, it makes a good deal of difference how the picture looks; whether somebody wishes to get something from the Government, or whether he wishes to to get something from the Government, or whether he wishes to avoid paying the Government something.

Mr. President, the Government has not paid for all these lands yet. I do not know exactly how much it has still to pay. It will approximate $15,000,000 which is still to be paid. There is still due on the Cherokee Outlet $4,980,000, which is drawing interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum, I believe. How much will necessarily be paid on the Great Sioux Reservation, on the Chippewa Reservation, on the Colville Reservation, it is impossible exactly to say; but at the lowest price more money, and considerably more money, has to be paid to the Indians for the Great Sioux Reservation than has already been paid, and so, I apprehend, with regard to the Colville and the Chippewa reservations.

I do not think that what is contemplated is exactly fair to the dians. We opened the lands in the Great Sioux Reservation upon the understanding that they were to be settled up at $1.50 an acre for those taken within a certain period of time; $1 an acre or $1.25 an acre, I believe, for those taken within another number of years, and 50 cents an acre for those not taken within ten years. Is it fair to the Indians to make them wait until the end of the ten years and then to pay them for the land at the rate of 50 cents an acre? As I understand the bill, for the 800,000 acres that have already been taken up in homestead settlement, the Government will be expected to pay the Indians $1.25 or $1.50 an acre, and the Indians

Indians—
Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to correct the Senator from Connecticut in regard to that matter, if he will permit me. After the lands were opened to settlement the homestead settler was to pay $1 an acre for the lands entered during the first three years, for the next two years 75 cents an acre, and thereafter 50 cents an acre. Very little of the land was taken during the first three years; and a little more was taken during the next two years. Seven hundred thousand acres out of 9,500,000 acres are all that have yet been taken.

have yet been taken.

Mr. PLATT. The lands ought to be paid for at the price stipulated to be paid.

Mr. PETTIGREW. One hundred and eleven thousand dollars has been paid. Mr. PLATT. However that may be and whatever the amount may be—and it is a considerable amount—it has to be paid by the Government in the future, whether or not it receives anything from those lands.

Now a single word about the difference between these lands and the lands to which the homestead act applied and to which it does yet apply. As I have said in my views as minority member of the committee, I conceive that there is an entirely different principle involved. At the time of the passage of the homestead law we had a large public domain. We had acquired the land for Territorial purposes. The treaty by which we acquired what is known as the Louisiana purchase was a political movement on the part of Mr. Jefferson—a political necessity. The lands were acquired for self-defense, and I venture to say it never entered the wildest imagination of Mr. Jefferson that the lands acquired by the Louisiana purchase were going to be needed for homes for the wildest imagination of Mr. Jefferson that the lands acquired by the Louisiana purchase were going to be needed for homes for American settlers. When the homestead law was passed we had been giving away land. We had not been giving them away to individuals, unless you make all the land grants to railroads gifts and donations to individuals, but we had been giving them away to States and to soldiers. Giving them to soldiers was giving them to individuals. That was not a donation, however. That was in a measure payment for their services in the Mexican war and the war of 1812. There was a good deal of feeling about the giving away of lands, donating them, to aid in the construction of railroads, and it was deemed much better for the interests of the country to dispose of the lands to actual settlers. And it was much better, Mr. President. much better, Mr. President.

But we never bought any land in this country from individuals or Indians, or from anyone, to open the same to homestead settlement. I apprehend that even the father of the bill, now sitting within reach of my eye, would have hesitated to have proposed a principle the English of which should be that the Government, with the money of all the people, should buy lands and then donate them to people who proposed to settle on them. That is what this measure is. In that it is entirely taken out both of the reason and the purpose of the homestead act.

Mr. President, we might just as well buy lands from any other individuals as from the Indians to make "free homes" for settlers or speculators, as the case may be. I hear a great many tirades here in the Senate about abandoned farms up in Connecticut and other parts of New England. There are not so many of them as there are supposed to be, but there are some farms there that could be bought very cheap, and if the Government will buy them and give them away in quantities of 160 or 40 acres there will be people without means found there who will be glad to go upon them and who will cultivate them, and, by economy and industry and saving, will support themselves and add to the wealth of the State. You might just as well ask the Government to go into Connecticut and buy the cheap farms there, or into Kansas and other States and buy the mortgaged farms that are going to be forcelesed as it is said and then denote them to somebody to set the foreclosed, as it is said, and then donate them to somebody to settle on, and to have them after five years' residence and occupation.

That is not the principle of the homestead act, Mr. President.
But that is the principle of this proposed act, and it is a principle applicable not only to the particular lands that have been opened to settlement on ceded Indian reservations and actually settled upon, but it is a principle to be applied to all the new lands that are to be settled upon hereafter in the United States. These Indian reservations are not yet as much diminished as in the nature of things they will be. These purchases have not been for the benefit of the Indians, as was suggested yesterday. The Indians have been almost dragooned into giving their consent to and ans have been almost dragooned into giving their consent to such purchases in order that white people might go upon them. Indian reservations have been Naboth's vineyards in the eye of certain people of this country. They were near at hand, they were coveted, and they were taken. But, Mr. President, we have not gotten through with this matter yet. So far as the speculative element enters into this desire for new lands, and it opters in largely it is like the daughters of the barsalcach. enters in largely, it is like the daughters of the horse-leech-it cries, "Give, give."

There are two classes of these homesteaders on ceded Indian reservations—I do not know but three. There are those who are looking for every fertile piece of land in every Indian reservation in the United States, and wanting to get it for nothing, or for far less than its value. That is one class that went into Oklahoma. There is another class of industrious, honest, intelligent people who were driven, perhaps by the spirit of adventure and the faswho were driven, perhaps by the spirit of adventure and the faswho were driven, perhaps by the spirit of adventure and the fascination which has always prevailed with regard to frontier life, to move on still nearer to the frontier, to get away, so to speak, from civilization, and they are industrious, they are intelligent, and they are thrifty. They deserve all that can be bestowed upon them properly and honestly. Then there is a third class, the restless, or, as described in this letter the other day, the ne'er-do-well, who would not stay long on the land even if they got it under the homestead laws. They are the shiftless class.

There are these three elements continually seeking for new land, and the Indian reservations have not yet been entirely despoiled and the Indian reservations have not yet been entirely despoiled for the benefit of these people. That will go on in the future. I wish I had the number of acres in Indian reservations still in the possession of Indians. As the work of allotment goes on and each Indian is given 160 acres there will be more lands available for white settlement. If this bill passes, the policy will prevail that the Government must buy these lands of the Indians and then donate them to the home seekers of the three classes of which I have spoken. And I have spoken plainly, and I think that even the Senator from Kansas who sits near me [Mr. Peffer] will not say that I have been invidious in the description of this homeseeking class.

So it is not solely a question whether the Government is going so it is not solely a question whether the Government is going to relinquish now a couple of million dollars, or $10,000,000, or $17,500,000, or $35,000,000, according to the report of the Secretary of the Interior. It is a question for the future. It is a question whether the Government is going to go into the business of buying something and giving it away. You can not disguise it; indeed, no attempt is made to disguise it. If the passage of the bill were urged alone on the ground of hardship for the settlers, that would be a good argument for a further extension of time only.

The country is full of hardship, Mr. President. There are more people in straits in this country than there are on these ceded Indian reservation lands. But the Government will not be called upon to donate anything to them. We have fires, and pestilence, and floods, and earthquakes, and men have hard luck who do not suffer calamity—they get out of employment. But they do not ask the Government to buy something and give it to them or to relinquish what they have assumed to pay the Government.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut

if the Government of the United States did not give the State of Connecticut several million acres of land?

Mr. PLATT. No, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. Did it not give the State of Connecticut a strip in Ohio

Mr. PLATT. Connecticut got that under its charter from King

Mr. ALLEN. Which was sold by the State of Connecticut and from which it got much of its wealth originally?

Mr. PLATT. My colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] is a better historian than I am, but my recollection is that Connecticut gave up to the General Government a good deal of land to which it was entitled under its charter, and I think on an investigation of history it will

Mr. ALLEN. Connecticut, Virginia, and many of the original States got a great portion of the public domain and sold it. The State of Massachusetts got all of the territory now known as the State of Maine.

Mr. PLATT. Connecticut had a charter for lands which extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and if Nebraska is on the same line of latitude and Connecticut had insisted on its rights it would have the land which is now embraced within the territory of the State that the Senator from Nebraska represents. do not know whether it is on exactly the same parallel of latitude.

Mr. ALLEN. What I want to call the attention of the Senator to is this: It seems to me that it is inconsistent to arraign the people of the section living on these arid lands for asking the Government to do something for them under the circumstances when the Senator's own State (and I say it without any feeling whatever) and every State in New England was the recipient at the hands of the Government of millions of acres of the finest lands we have, which were sold for a great many dollars. You were participants in these things in the best lands. Why do you mow deny to these poor settlers a claim upon the arid lands?

Mr. PLATT. The Senator is referring to the land given to agricultural colleges, to agricultural college scrip?

Mr. ALLEN. No; I am referring to the early history of this

Mr. PLATT. I understand that Connecticut under its charter claimed as of right all these lands and a great many more than it finally retained, but the whole matter was adjusted by a compromise between the Government and Connecticut, in which Connecti-got the worst of the bargain. There is nothing to that point.

Mr. ALLEN. But you got a great many million acres of very fertile land in Ohio and sold it.

Mr. PLATT. Connecticut got it under a charter from King

Mr. ALLEN. It is questionable whether you had it or not; you got it at least

Mr. PLATT. We had possession of a portion of Pennsylvania, the Susquehanna Valley and Wyoming. We had a settlement there, two organized counties, with representation in our legisla-

Mr. President, I have been somewhat diverted from the thread of my thought and argument. There are individuals suffering in Connecticut, people in hard luck, people who, with all their industry and thrift, can scarcely manage to support large families. The Senators who are advocating the passage of the pending bill would be loudest in opposing any bill that might be proposed donating something to them. No matter how the case may be presented, it amounts simply to a donation, and I object to it most strongly, because I do not want to see the spread and extension of the idea that the Government is to take care of the individual. That idea has been running very fast, Mr. President, in these later days. Possibly the homestead law has to some extent resulted in the encouragement of it; and there is another thing which I will not speak of now, and which I think more than anything else has fostered this spirit of going to the General Government to have individual affairs righted, and that is our system of Government paper money. I am not going to bring that into this debate, however; but owing to one or another of these causes men seem to have lost sight of the true principles of government. The man who should now say that governments were organized and administered for the protection of life and property, and stop there, would be supposed to be dwelling in the past, and not to have come—

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator apply his argument to a protective tariff law?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, I am not to be diverted from this argument into a tariff argument. I can show, and I will show at the proper time, that there is no class legislation in a tariff law; but I am not going to be drawn or diverted into that. However, I do want here and now to enter my protest against what I will not offensively call the Populistic idea in this country, that the people who want anything are going to go as individuals to the Government and get it.

Mr. ALLEN. Nobody believes that that I know of.
Mr. PLATT. That is the tendency of everything. We talk about its being a crime to buy and sell votes, and yet too often about its being a crime to buy and sen votes, and yet too orien in voting the voter thinks only how he is to be materially benefited by his vote. There is not a very great deal of difference, Mr. President, between the idea of so voting and the idea of selling a vote. If a man votes simply to better himself financially, as he supposes, he does not differ a great deal in principle from the man who sells his vote. We are running wrong, Mr. President, and this bill and hundreds of other bills which are here illustrate it, and illustrate the dangerous tendency of the doctrines which are promulgated at the present time.

I said that if I were to announce what was acknowledged in the early history of the Government, that the object of the Government was to protect life and property and ended there, I would lay myself open to the charge of being an old fogy, behind the age.

I need not pursue the subject, Mr. President, but if we are going to do what this bill asks us to do, why should we stop there? If we are going to buy lands in order that we may give a man 160 we are going to buy lands in order that we may give a man 100 acres of land to settle upon free, why should we stop there? Why not buy him his agricultural implements; why not buy him his horses? I will not refer again to the way the governor of Oklahoma describes this "arid" land, but if a person makes a homestead entry upon arid land, supposing that it is agricultural, why should he not call on the Government to irrigate it for him? Where is the Government to stop?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PLATT. For a question, yes.

Mr. CARTER. If it is proper according to the view of the Senator from Connecticut, and that is manifestly his view, to tax to the settler upon the public domain the cost to the Government of acquiring the title to the land upon which the settler locates, why should not the principle be applied to the extent of charging to each settler his proportionate share of the amount paid for the Louisiana purchase, likewise the amount of cost connected with the acquisition of territory from Mexico, which is to some extent included in the particular section of country involved in the bill?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, Mr. President, I have been unfortunate in the statement of my views as a member of the committee and of my statement this morning. The very thing I was talking about is this: We have never until now been asked to buy land for the purpose of donating it to individuals.

Mr. CARTER. For whom was the land purchased originally,

Mr. CARTER. For whom was the land purchased originally, then, in the case of the purchase of Louisiana?

Mr. PLATT. It was purchased for the public defense, and Jefferson never supposed, nobody supposed, that it was bought for the purpose of giving it to somebody to settle upon. There is the distinction in these cases. It is the manifest, obvious distinction which Senators seem unable to see. The land that was included in the Louisiana purchase was in my schoolboy days marked on the map, a greater portion of it, as "The Great American Desert." The idea

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to call the attention of the Senator, if he will permit me, to the fact that our integrity as a nation was not menaced in the slightest degree when Mr. Jefferson purchased the southwestern lands of the French Government. Our Government had not been threatened by France, nor by Spain, nor by any other nation. While the purchase had in a certain nor by any other nation. While the purchase had in a certain sense a political significance, the great purpose of it, as announced by Mr. Jefferson at the time and subsequently, was to furnish homes for the citizens of the United States.

Mr. PLATT. We will look that up hereafter. I think I am right. I do not wish to be diverted, and I repeat that now, for the first time in our history, it is urged that the Government ought to buy land for the avowed purpose of giving it away to individuals who will settle upon it. uals who will settle upon it.

Now, Mr. President, I think I have said all I need to say in relation to the subject. I think the picture of suffering has been overdrawn, and I have cited a pretty intelligent witness (the governor of Oklahoma) to show that it has.

If it be a question of the inability of the settlers to pay for these lands because of successive droughts, I am perfectly willing to do what the Government has already done, extend the time. But if there will be but little benefit in relinquishing to settlers the money due for these lands. If the drought every year is to make it impossible for them to cultivate these lands, it is little benefit that they will derive from such relinquishment.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that in some instances lands have been settled upon which are not adapted to agriculture, but of the 33,000,000 acres which have been opened, a third of it or a half of it is as beautiful land, is as fertile land, as rich land, as valuable land as ever lay under the sun.

It is not alone the man who is hard pushed who is to receive the benefit of this legislation. This donation is to fall upon all alike, upon the man who has got a fortune in his farm and the man who is living in the arid region in the sod dugout. Like the rain falling on the just and unjust, this benefit, this donation, is to be showered upon all without discrimination.

I do not know that I desire to say anything further on this sub-I only intended to speak for a few minutes, but I have been somewhat diverted during my line of argument and have exceeded the time which I thought I should take.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I have listened with much surprise to the strange sentiments which have been expressed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt]. He says that he does not want people to get into the habit of coming to Congress for relief when their business does not pay. I have read with much interest the published reports of the various delegations which have visited the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House have visited the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House with regard to their business, and every one of them placed their demands for higher rates of duty on the ground that their business did not pay, and on no other ground. We have a committee of the other House and we shall have one here to listen to those engaged in particular kinds of business as to whether their business pays, and I supposed that the Senator from Connecticut was in favor of that kind of policy which would relieve men when their business did not pay. I think there have been several delegations already from Connecticut and there will be more.

As to the position that the homestead act ought not to be

As to the position that the homestead act ought not to be extended to these settlers because the land was bought by the Government, it seems to me that that is in violation of every principle of disposing of the public lands which has been approved by all parties for the last thirty years or more. The Government was some time coming to the conclusion that the country at large would be benefited by allowing settlers to occupy the public land would be benefited by allowing settlers to occupy the public land and to acquire homes without charge. That was, however, adopted as a public policy. The greater portion of the great Mississippi Valley was disposed of under that policy, and a more beneficent policy never was adopted by any nation, as witness the progress of that section of our country.

It makes no difference how the Government got those lands.

If it is the best policy to encourage settlement on them, why vio-late that principle? If you will take the rich lands a little farther east you will find that they were taken by homestead settlers. Now, why should people who are going on poorer lands be de-prived of the privileges which have been extended to all under a policy which has enriched the Government? There is nothing in that argument. There should be no discrimination against those people, and particularly now, when there is not a crop produced people, and particularly now, when there is not a crop produced in that region which will pay to-day the cost of production and of getting it to market. How that may be hereafter I do not know. I know, however, that there is but a small portion of Oklahoma which has sufficient rainfall to produce regular crops. I have been over that country, and there is about one-third, or nearly that, of Kanass, and of Nebraska, and as you go north you will find it in the Deketes and as row secret receivilged. will find it in the Dakotas, and as you go south you will find it in Oklahoma and Texas, where it is very hard to make settlements at all. The picture of the distress there has not been overdrawn; and when the Senator from Connecticut speaks of the eagerness of those people to acquire homes and go upon this land, he uses that as an argument why they should be discriminated against. I think their enterprise in going upon a country situated as that is and trying to make a living should be commended and encouraged. If by their efforts they can make that country and encouraged. If by their enerts they can make that country produce, if they can make it furnish a market to the other sections, if they can make it a tax-paying country. I say let them do it. By the same policy you have made great States, and it seems to me pitiable higgling to say that those people shall be discriminated against on account of what the Government has paid for

The Government has applied the homestead principle to all lands it has acquired, and it should be applied in this case. It should be applied particularly to all the lands that are left, because of the difficulty of settlement. It is doubtful whether they can be occupied, and it is to the interest of all that every acre of land which can be cultivated and occupied and made a home shall be We have the Indians to support anyway. We are makso used. We have the Indians to support anyway. We are making an arrangement with the Indians. There is one-third—I do not know but one-half—of all the land in the Mississippi Valley which has been bought from Indians. You make trades with them; you make donations to them. You have supported them at an expense of millions of dollars each year, and when you acquired those lands you opened them to homesteads, and it has been the invariable rule where an Indian reservation was removed been the invariable rule where an indian reservation was removed to provide that the homestead law should prevail. Why this exception was made I do not know. The exception was wrong, Now, you say the Government will lose by it. The Government will lose nothing. The millions spoken of never can be collected from the settlers. A man in his natural life upon one of those farms at the present price of production can not raise and sell enough to feed and clothe his children and then pay the amount the Government demands.

I know times are hard; but it is not the fault of the settlers on the frontier that they are hard. The Senator intimates that they complain of the monetary condition that starves them to death, and might want paper or something else if you let them live. might want paper or something else if you let them live. If he is going to exterminate everybody who is opposed to contraction and hard times, if he is going to apply the iron rule, let him apply it to Connecticut; let him apply it to Massachusetts; let him apply it to the army of supplicants for special privileges which is visiting the committee of the other House to-day. If you want to discipline them and make them vote right, and starve them to do it, commence at home and starve your own people first.

commence at home and starve your own people first.

But we are not asking for any Government aid, we are not asking for any special privileges to these people. We are asking for the application of a principle which has been commended by every wise statesman for the last thirty years; we are asking for the application of a principle which has built up States; we are asking for the application of a principle which has made independent homes; and there is no reason now to come forward and violate it on account of some piggardly hand trade when the conpendent homes; and there is no reason now to come forward and violate it on account of some niggardly, hard trade when the conditions are worse than they ever have been. The Government has to take care of the Indians in any event, and we are paying out to the Indians six or eight million dollars a year for that purpose. You have removed them from place to place and opened reservations for settlement, and now when you come to this arid region, where the people have to undergo the greatest privations and sufferings to live at all, to say that they must leave their homes or pay a price which is impossible to pay under present conditions, seems to me repugnant to common sense, justice, and conditions, seems to me repugnant to common sense, justice, and fair play.

All the Indian reservations which are opened to settlement should be opened under the homestead law. They are not intended for speculation. A man who travels over that country and would attempt to speculate upon those people who are attempting to make homes, a man who would propose to do it, knowing the conditions which prevail there, has a heart which ought not to be in an American breast. It is an outrage to change the principle as against these people. They ask for no donations. We ask none for them. We ask for the principles of the land laws to be applied to them as they have been applied to settlers in the great Mississippi Valley; we ask that they shall have the poor privilege of building up homes in that arid region if they can.

Senators talk about it being a bad principle to make these people dependent upon the Government; to encourage them to come here and ask privileges from the Government by extending to them the and ask privileges from the Government by extending to them the "laws under which all the great States have grown up and been populated. It would be a bad principle in the Government and unjust and detrimental to discriminate against them. Give them the same privileges that other American citizens have had who the same privileges that other American citizens have had who wanted to obtain public lands so far as they can get them. They can not get the same privileges. The best of the public lands are gone, and they are gone into the hands of settlers who have made the country great. To now attempt to reimburse ourselves out of the remainder of the desert lands, and to persecute the people who are trying to live there with the hardest struggle that any people ever had in the world, it seems to me is the essence of cruelty and a violation of every principle of justice and good government. I hope we shall not hear any more sentiments of that kind in the Senate.

I do not want to criticise those who are selving the Government.

kind in the Senate.

I do not want to criticise those who are asking the Government to give them special privileges, because the protective principle, properly applied, is beneficial to protect all; but the protective principle can not reach the farmers of this country. They have properly applied, is beneficial to protect all; but the protective principle can not reach the farmers of this country. They have to rely on their exports, and we have to rely on their exports to pay our foreign obligations and to buy what we buy from abroad. We have by legislation, the legislation of New England and New York, placed them in a position of competition where their products are below the cost of production. We have given the standard silver countries a hundred per cent advantage in the European markets. We do not propose any tariff for them. We do not propose any relief for the great agricultural interest. Nobody proposes that. Here the poorest of all the agriculturists of the United States are to be punished and dealt with on a different principle from that applied in the Mississippi Valley. It is unjust. If New England wants a market for her products, it is for her principle from that applied in the Mississippi Valley. It is unjust. If New England wants a market for her products, it is for her interest and her benefit that that section of country should be settled. She has made millions and hundreds of millions, and perhaps thousands of millions, of dollars by the beneficent policy of the Government in giving away public lands, making homes, bringing their products into market, and furnishing a market for the products of New England. That was the theory, that the United States would prosper more by having these lands settled, so as to furnish a market for manufactures, so as to aid in paying taxes, than it would by extorting money from settlers by the sale so as to furnish a market for manufactures, so as to aid in paying taxes, than it would by extorting money from settlers by the sale of these lands. That is not the policy of the Government. If the old policy is to be reversed and the poor people who go upon the poor desert lands and attempt to reclaim them and make homes there are to be treated in this harsh manner, in violation of what has been done for all others, let us know it, and the people will keep out of those regions; but to talk about those people as unjust and dishonest, to talk about them as asking special privileges, is too repugnant to the facts and common sense to escape severe condemnation.

IMPRISONMENT OF JULIO SANGUILLY.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent to present a paper from a gentleman who has been elected as a Republican member of the next Congress, who has recently been in Habana, and I ask that the statement be read and printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and the statement will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATEMENT IN RELATION TO JULIO SANGUILLY.

I also had a talk with Julio Sanguilly, who stated that he had been confined in the Cabanas for a period of twenty-three months. It appears from his statement that the day before the rebellion broke out in Cuba, while taking a bath in his house, he was arrested and thrown into prison. He was tried and condemned to punishment by a military tribunal, the sentence being that he should be punished perpetually in chains, etc. The United States authorities protested on the ground that Sanguilly was a citizen of the United States, he having been naturalized in New Orleans and having resided there for some time, and that he was taken without arms and should be tried by the civil authorities and not the military authorities. An appeal was taken to the authorities at Madrid, and this sentence was set aside. He was retried, and a few days ago a similar sentence imposed on him. The lawyer who conducted the first trial of Sanguilly was also thrown in prison and is now in the cabanas along with Sanguilly. The lawyer who managed the appeal in Spain has been deprived of his office and all emoluments attached thereto by the authorities at Madrid. A witness who could have proven Sanguilly's entire innocence, namely, Lopez Coloma, was a few days before this last trial taken from his cell in the Cabanas, where he had been imprisoned for a considerable time, and shot without any trial, as Sanguilly said, for the purpose of preventing him from testifying.

An appeal must be tak-n within a few days, or, unless the United States interferes, the witness will be transported to the penal colony in North Africa in accordance with the sentence passed a few days ago. Sanguilly stated that he did not believe that he could get any lawyer to take his case and conduct his appeal, as the fate of his other two lawyers who conducted the former proceedings would deter others from undertaking his case again.

Sanguilly seems to be a man of about 60 years of age, quite gray, and complained that the imprisonment during the past twenty-three months was breaking his health so that he could not longer endure it; and he desired that the United States Government take action in his case at once by inquiring into the cause of his detention and the unfair method by which he has been tried and convicted. He claimed that there is no possible testimony as to his being implicated in the rebellion, but that he was simply confined because he might perhaps have been guilty of some offense in the future, yet that he was guilty of no offense whatever when arrested, and nothing was proven or could be proven againt him.

MRS. ELIZABETH GNASH.

Mr. GEAR. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 3035) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?
Mr. COCKRELL. Has that bill just been reported?
Mr. GEAR. It was reported on the 5th instant, I will say to the Senator from Missouri

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the bill is on the Calendar with a favorable report. The Senator from Iowa now asks unanimous consent for its consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3035) granting a pension to Mrs. Elizabeth Gnash. It proposes to place on the pension roll, at $12 per month, the name of Elizabeth Gnash, widow of Thomas Gnash, late private Company G, Third Regiment Iowa Cavalry. The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HENDERSON MARPLE.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 3877) granting a pension to Henderson Marple. It is a bill which has been reported favorably from the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRYE. It will take the next two hours to consider the bills which, by unanimous consent, were to be taken up at this hour. Is the bill to which the Senator refers a very short one?

Mr. COCKRELL. It is only a short bill, and will not take half

Mr. FRYE. Then I shall not interpose an objection. Mr. FRYE. Then I shall not interpose an objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3877) granting a pension to Henderson Marple. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Henderson Marple, late a private in Capt. A. J. Hart's company, Morgan County Provisional Enrolled Missouri Militia, at $12 per month; and provides that the pension shall be paid to him and that no part of it shall be retained by any official of the Government by reason of any pension heretofore paid to Henderson Marple.

PACIFIC RAILROADS SINKING FUND.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to offer a resolution, and after it has been read I shall ask for its present consideration, unless there be objection to it

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Alabama will be read, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments are hereby authorized and instructed to make examination into the means by which certain papers mentioned in the report of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, which is hereto attached, have disappeared from the records of the Treasury Department.

And said committee will inquire and report whether any and what person has abstracted said papers from the files or records of said Department, and whether any officer or employee of said Department had knowledge of, or was in any way party or privy to, any unlawful act connected with the loss, destruction, or removal of such papers. And said committee in the execution of this order shall have power to require the appearance of witnesses, and to examine them under oath.

resolution.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I merely heard the reading of the concluding part of the resolution. I do not know whether it is liable to the suggestion I am about to make or not. It is very convenient in all such cases to have the phrase used, "said committee or a subcommittee of their number."

Mr. MORGAN. It will not be necessary to provide for a subcommittee, because the transaction to be investigated is right here in the Treasury Department.

in the Treasury Department.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know how that may be, but it is very convenient sometimes to have the power of a committee to send for persons and papers and administer oaths, etc., exercised by a subcommittee, and it brings such subcommittee of the Senate for that purpose within the statutory provision.

Mr. MORGAN. I will modify the resolution by inserting the words " or a subcommittee thereof."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF NAVIGATION LAWS.

Mr. FRYE. Under the order adopted yesterday assigning this hour for the consideration of certain bills from the Committee on Commerce, I call for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2663) to amend the laws relating to navigation.

I will state that there is no need of reading the bill as it came from the House of Representatives, as, when I reported from the Senate committee an amendment as a substitute, the substitute was adopted in place of the bill as it came from the other House. Therefore, there is no need of reading the original bill, which is erased. It is simply necessary to read the amendment.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 2663) to amend the laws relating to navigation.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce-was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

Such place shall be securely constructed, properly lighted, drained, and ventilated, properly protected from weather and sea, and, as far as practicable, properly shut off and protected from the effluvium of cargo or bilge water.

Fishing vessels, yachts, and pilot boats are hereby exempted from the provisions of section 1 of chapter 130 of the laws of 1835, entitled "An act to provide for deductions from the gross tonnage of vessels of the United States," so far as said section prescribes the amount of space which shall be appropriated to the crew and provides that said space shall be kept free from goods or stores not being the personal property of the crew in use during the voyage.

And on and after June 30, 1898, every steamboat of the United States plying upon the Mississippi River or its tributaries shall furnish an appropriate place for the crew, which shall conform to the requirements of this section so far as they shall be applicable thereto by providing sleeping room in the engine room of the steamboats properly protected from the cold, winds, and rain by means of suitable awnings or screens on either side of the guards or sides and forward, reaching from the boiler deck to the lower or main deck, und

"SEC. 4576. The master of every vessel bound on a foreign voyage or engaged in the whale fishery shall exhibit the certified copy of the list of the crew to the first boarding officer at the first port in the United States at which he shall arrive on his return, and also produce the persons named therein to the boarding officer, whose duty it shall be to examine the men with such list and to report the same to the collector; and it shall be the duty of the collector at the port of arrival, where the same is different from the port from which the vessel originally sailed, to transmit a copy of the list so reported to him to the collector of the port trom which such vessel originally sailed. For each failure to produce any person on the certified copy of the list of the crew the master and owner shall be severally liable to a penalty of $400, to be sued for, prosecuted, and disposed of in such manner as penalties and forfettures which may be incurred for offenses against the laws relating to the collection of duties; but such penalties shall not be incurred on account of the master not producing to the first boarding officer any of the persons contained in the list who may have been discharged in a foreign country with the consent of the consul, vice-consul, commercial agent, or vice commercial agent there residing, certified in writing, under his hand and official seal, to be produced to the collector with the other persons composing the crew, nor on account of any such person dying or absconding or being forcibly impressed into other service of which satisfactory proof shall be then also exhibited to the collector."

SEC. 4. That section 4540 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended by substituting the words "circuit judge."

SEC. 9. That fees for the entry direct from a foreign port and for the clearance direct to a foreign port of a vessel navigating the waters of the northern, northeastern, and northwestern frontiers of the United States otherwise than by sea, prescribed by section 482 of the Revised Statutes, are abolished. Where such fees, under existing laws, constitute in whole or in part the compensation of a collector of customs, such officer shall hereafter receive a fixed sum for each year equal to the amount which he would have been entitled to receive as fees for such services during said year.

SEC. 10. That section 465 of the Revised Statutes be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 465. A vessel registered pursuant to law, which by sale has become the property of a foreigner, shall be entitled to a new register upon afterwards becoming American property, unless it has been enlarged or undergone change in build outside the United States."

SEC. 11. That section 13 of chapter 344 of the laws of 1874 be, and is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 18. That the Secretary of the Treasury may, upon application therefor, remit or mitigate any penalty provided for in this act, or discontinue any prosecution to recover the same, upon such terms as he, in his discretion, shall think proper, and shall have anthority to ascertain the facts upon all such applications in such manner and under such remains as he

Steam vessels, when towing, shall sound three blasts of quick succession repeated at intervals of not more than one minute. (b) Sail vessels under way shall sound a fog horn at intervals of not more than one minute.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. SEWELL. I should like to ask a question for information.

On page 18, line 10, there is a provision that "steam vessels under way shall sound a steam whistle placed before the funnel"

Mr. FRYE. That is the same requirement for what are called inland waters as is now required by the international rules of navigation. That is why that is adopted.

Mr. SEWELL. "At intervals of not more than one minute."

Mr. SEWELL. "At intervals of Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir: in a fog.

Mr. SEWELL. It does not say in a fog. That is the trouble. The section does not say that it shall be done in a fog. Mr. FRYE. It does in the sections to which that relates.

Mr. SEWELL. It would not be required, except in a fog?
Mr. FRYE. Certainly not.
Mr. WHITE. I attract the attention of the Senator from Maine to a criticism that has been made of the bill which we have reported from the Committee on Commerce, so that he may explain it. On page 12 there is a provision to this effect:

All vessels under 100 tons register shall have a space of not less than 72 cubic feet and not less than 12 superficial feet measured on the deck or floor of that place for each seaman or apprentice lodged therein.

That would be a room, say, 6 feet long and 6 feet in altitude and 2 feet wide, or, say, 4 feet in altitude, 4 feet in length, and 2 feet in width. The bill as it came from the other House provided for 100 feet. Am I not right? Mr. FRYE. Yes.

Mr. FRYE. Yes. Mr. WHITE. It is said by those who are more interested perhaps in the seamen than those who own the vessels that 72 feet are I have also been told, and I presume it to be a fact, that in England, Germany, and other countries but 72 feet are allowed. The seamen contend, however, that the arrangements of the vessels there are such that 72 feet are more valuable than 72 feet upon our ships as constructed in this country. I should like to hear from the Senator from Maine regarding this matter.

Mr. FRYE. I do not understand there is any maritime nation in the world which requires a larger space for the crew than that which is provided for in this bill, and I do not understand that there is any difference in the construction of ships which compels an American ship to have a larger space than a foreign ship. will be observed that the space required here for the seaman is larger than the space which we get in Pullman cars. It is larger than the space which we get in the cabin of any of our steamboats. It is open to the free air, to ventilation, and so on; and I think it is larger than the midshipman gets upon ships of war to-day. I found on inquiry that in all probability more than one-half of the vessels that are to-day on the ocean could not comply with the requirements contained in the bill as it came to us from the other House

Mr. WHITE. That is the important feature which I wish to et at. The Senator from Maine has investigated the subject, and get at. he finds that it would be impossible for our vessels to comply with the House provision.

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir; and still be freighters.

Mr. WHITE. Was there any evidence taken before the House committee on the matter of the 100-feet allowance which they made?

Mr. FRYE. I understand only from the sailor who represents the San Francisco union.

Mr. WHITE. He has complained to me that it is not sufficient, and I have similar complaints from other sources. Personally I have no technical knowledge about it, and I am unable to say of my own knowledge whether the space is sufficient or insufficient.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill

The bill was passed.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. FRYE, Mr. Nelson, and Mr. White were appointed.

LAWS RELATING TO AMERICAN SEAMEN.

Mr. FRYE. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. 6399) to amend the laws relating to American seamen.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Committee on Commerce reported an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which has heretofore been agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. That is correct.

Mr. PERKINS. I notice by the history of the bill that the amendment has already been agreed to. Yesterday when the bill was made the special order for consideration to-day at 4 o'clock I had not need to bill. had not read the bill. There are a number of amendments which

I should like to offer, and I think they will commend themselves to the Senator from Maine, who is an authority upon maritime law and affairs, and who has given the subject matter a great deal of attention. I feel confident that they will appeal to his sense of justice and fairness, and that he will accept the amend-ments. Therefore, if it is agreeable to the committee, I should like to have them considered while the bill is as in Committee of the Whole. They relate, I will say to the Senator from Maine, particularly to the imprisonment clause.

Mr. FRYE. We are just entering upon the consideration of the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. So I understand, but it has been read.
Mr. FRYE. No; it has not been read.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the amendment reported by the Committee on Commerce in the nature of a substitute for the House provision has heretofore been adopted. It will be needless to read the bill as it came from the other House. The substitute will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the enacting clause and

If any seaman shall neglect to render himself on board the vessel for which he has shipped at the time mentioned in such memorandum without giving twenty-four hours' notice of his inability to do so, and if the master of the vessel shall, on the day in which such neglect happened, make an entry in the log book of such vessel of the name of such seaman, and shall in like manner note the time that he so neglected to render himself after the time appointed, then every such seaman shall forfeit, for every hour which he shall so neglect to render himself, one-half of one day's pay, according to the rate of wages agreed upon, to be deducted out of his wages. If any such seaman shall wholly neglect to render himself on board of such vessel, or having rendered himself on board shall afterwards desert, he shall forfeit all of the wages or emoluments which he has then earned; and, also, in the discretion of the court, he shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than one month."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is asked that there be unanimous consent to amend the bill in its present shape as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and by unanimous consent amendments will be received. ment offered by the Senator from California will be stated.

The Secretary. In section 2, line 23, page 26, after the word "earned," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the section in the following words:

And, also, in the discretion of the court, he shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than one month.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from California.

Mr. FRYE. I should very decidedly object to the amendment. Mr. PERKINS. I have had some experience in nautical affairs, as well as in civil business matters. There is no law of which I am aware on the statutes of the United States or upon the statute books of any State of the Union by which a person can be imprisoned for the violation of a civil contract. Many years ago England and many European countries passed such a law, but to their credit England and Norway have repealed those laws, and England and Norway have to-day a larger tonnage plying the ocean in the foreign trade and following the flags of their respective countries than have all the other nations of the world.

The United States have not heretofore taken a back seat in the treatment of their seamen and in recognizing the duty which they owe to their fellow-man of doing unto others as they would wish them to do unto them. It seems to me we can well afford in this case to punish the seaman by having him forfeit his wages and his effects, but I do not think we should go to the extent of imprisoning him because he has failed to perform a civil contract.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from California allow me for a moment? Did any such law ever exist in this country? Did imprisonment ever exist in this country for such a cause?

Mr. FRYE. Yes; and it was made a positive duty of the court to imprison the seaman.

Mr. HILL. It does not now exist; it has been repealed? Mr. WHITE. It was repealed, and it is not exactly son Mr. WHITE. It was repealed, and it is not exactly sought to reenact it. The imprisonment clause in modified form is put into this bill. We have no provision for imprisonment as the law now exists. Am I not right?

Mr. FRYE. In the coastwise trade.
Mr. WHITE. In the coastwise trade.
Mr. HILL. How long ago was it repealed?

Mr. WHITE, Two years ago, I think.
Mr. FRYE. About two years ago.
Mr. HILL. I should like to hear some reason why we propose to reenact it now.

Mr. FRYE. I can give the Senator from New York a reason, Mr. FRYE. I can give the Senator from New York a reason, and I will give it with an illustration. Three or four months ago a ship was lying loaded in the city of Bath waiting for a crew. Our crews are nearly all shipped in Boston. An agent was sent to Boston to get the crew. He obtained a crew, and paid for obtaining the crew. They were duly shipped by the shipping commissioner. He then paid their traveling expenses from Boston to Bath. They stayed overnight on board the ship, and then, without any average at all deserted and went back to Boston. without any excuse at all, deserted and went back to Boston, leaving the ship at a large demurrage for at least a week.

Now, the penalty which exists to-day is the forfeiture of the wages earned. They had not earned any wages. It is no penalty at all; it does not amount to anything, and our shipmasters say it is impossible for them to undertake to do business unless there is a greater penalty than simply that of forfeiture of the wages. This is in the coastwise trade, let me say to the Senator from New York. It always happens in these cases that the desertion is when the first shipment is made. It is not when they are off on a voyage, or anything of that kind, but when the first shipment is made, and the forfeiture of the wages is a mere nothing, a bagatelle, and you can not hold a crew a moment by it.

Now, the law which has existed heretofore compelled the court to imprison for a given length of time. This provision simply says in the discretion of the court the seamen may be imprisoned for thirty days. Mr. HOAR.

Is there a law in existence now that compels the court to imprison?

Mr. FRYE. It was repealed two years ago. This provision is simply put in the bill as a deterrent on the sailors, so that they will not treat their contracts with utter levity and leave without any decent excuse at all. Of course if there were nothing in the case which called for the court to inflict a further penalty, the court would not do it, it being left in the discretion of the court.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me to make a further inquiry? The Senator stated, of course, an extreme case, where the seamen obtained their moneys in advance on a promise, which of course would not make it obtaining money under false pretenses; but is the imprisonment limited to those cases where they obtain moneys virtually on false pretenses?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir; it is not limited.

Mr. HILL. But it goes further, does it not, and inflicts imprisonment to follow the simple violation of the penalty?

Mr. FRYE. Wherever the sailors have made a contract to ship at a given time on a certain ship and desert, then, in the discretion of the court, they may be imprisoned for thirty days.

Mr. PERKINS. The illustration given by my friend from Maine is quite familiar to me, but I do not see that it differs materially from one I will cite that occurred a short time ago in my own State. A mining company, engaged in mining, having a property worth more than twice the value of an ordinary coast. a property worth more than twice the value of an ordinary coasting vessel, met with an accident, and they sent to San Francisco for a large number of miners. They were paid their expenses of passage, board, brokerage, etc., and taken to the mine to operate it. When they reached there, the mine they believed to be unsafe, or for other reasons which were satisfactory to them, they declined to commence work in the mine, and those who had advanced the

But what would my friend from Maine say if we had a law upon our statute books in California imprisoning those men in the discretion of the court, a country justice of the peace, and in some of our Western States the justices of the peace have not been students of Blackstone all of their lives? What would he say if the law had imposed the penalty for their violation of this civil con-aw had imposed the penalty for their violation of this civil contract of sending them to prison?

I think the same rule should apply to our coasting vessels. We have some bright, able, sober, conscientious men who are following the coasting trade upon the Atlantic, the Pacific, and the Gulf coasts. They are conscientious and honest. There are others, as is the case in all other trades, who are not so reliable. I believe that we can force them to their contract without having this penal clause attached to our laws. Our whole nature revolts at the idea that we can force them to their contract without having this penal clause attached to our laws. Our whole nature revolts at the idea that when a man has committed no wrong, not even petty larceny, a justice of the peace may, in his discretion, send him to prison for thirty days. I hope the amendment I have offered will prevail.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to say a word with relation to this matter. The section to be amended is 4522 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. That section I will read as it existed two years ago, and, as far as I can see, as it stands to-day. If Senators will follow the reading and take the proposed amendment of the law, they can observe the difference between the measure now before they can observe the difference between the measure now before the Senate and the old statute. I will read the old statute. Sec-tion 4522 of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

tion 4522 of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

At the foot of every such contract to ship upon such a vessel of the burden of 50 tons or upward there shall be a memorandum in writing of the day and the hour on which the seamen who ship and subscribe shall render themselves on board to begin the voyage agreed upon. If any such seaman shall neglect to render himself on board the vessel for which he has shipped at the time mentioned in such memorandum, and if the master of the vessel shall, on the day on which such neglect happened, make an entry in the log book of such vessel of the name of such seaman, and shall in like manner note the time that he so neglected to render himself, after the time appointed, every such seaman shall forfeit for every hour which he shall so neglect to render himself one day's pay, according to the rate of wages agreed upon, to be deducted out of his wages. If any such seaman shall wholly neglect to render himself on board of such vessel, or having rendered himself on board shall afterwards desert and escape, so that the vessel proceed to sea without him, he shall be liable to pay to the master, gwner, or consignee of the vessel a sum equal to that paid to him by advance at the time of signing the contract, over and besides the sum so advanced, both which sums shall be recoverable in any court, or before any justice of any State, city, town, or county within the United States, which, by the laws thereof, have cognizance of debts of equal value, against such seaman or mariner, or his surety or sureties, in case he shall have given surety to proceed the voyage.

That is the whole of the section. Hence the former penal clause

That is the whole of the section. Hence the former penal clause to which the Senator from Maine referred, and which, my recollection is, was incorporated in the old statute, must be in some other section of the Revised Statutes, for there is no clause in section 4522 of the Revised Statutes providing for any imprisonment whatever. I mention that as perhaps from a remark I made a few moments ago the Senate might be led into error as to the former law.

At the time this matter was under consideration, not this par-ticular amendment, but at the time we considered a similar bill, perhaps worded as this amendment is worded, I stated in the committee that I felt an aversion to providing for the infliction of a penalty by imprisonment in any civil action. Formerly, as we all know, debts were collected to a large extent in that way, and gradually, as we have progressed somewhat, we have abolished that method of enforcing obligations. When it seemed to be conceded that England, Germany, France, Norway, and Sweden were able to get along without such a penal provision, it struck me. and I am still of the impression, that this Government can not afford to enact more drastic regulations for seamen than those nations themselves have found essential.

I have an aversion, as I have already stated, to enforcing provisions of this kind. It is true that there is a discretion lodged in the judge.

And, also, in the discretion of the court, he shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than one month.

But if we are to enforce this law at all the man must be arrested

But if we are to enforce this law at all the man must be arrested practically to bring him within the jurisdiction of the court. He will be arrested, and when brought before the court it will be within the power of the man who sits upon the bench to send him to jail. It is against the conference of that power, not the fear of its extremely wrongful exercise, that I feel like protesting.

It is true that the judge may be lenient and that he may never punish anyone except in an extreme case. Loss often comes to men who have invested their capital by reason of the malconduct of men who are employed to act as sailors. Yet that is but an example of the many instances which we find every day in every walk of life. We may violate our civil contracts, and if unfortunately we have no pecuniary resources, it may be that the person mately we have no pecuniary resources, it may be that the person whom we have wronged can never compensate himself.

But I am opposed to making a discrimination against this class of men. I am opposed to enacting a law which will give to the gentlemen who are engaged in the transaction of commerce on the seas, the shipowners, ability to incarcerate their fellow-man, when we and the civilized world generally have abandoned imprisonment in civil cases, at least in the absence of fraud; and in some States we do not imprison them at all.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator to explain, if he pleases, his statement that this is an imprisonment in a civil

Mr. WHITE. It is not. The expression "in a civil case" was, of course, inaccurate. When I said "case" I did not refer to an action in court, but a matter which was purely one of dollars and cents between the individuals and not involving anything which cents between the individuals and not involving anything which in the ordinary sense could be called criminal.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator, I suppose, or the Senator reporting the bill, understands that this must be by a complaint according to due process of criminal law, as the Constitution requires; and all the rights preserved in criminal cases are preserved.

Mr. WHITE. I understand that, but I object to making that a crime. This, of course, is not a case of something that is bad in itself, I mean in a penal sense. It is merely violating an agreement to do some work. It is not a default which in the ordinary sense would be termed criminal, or against which, I conceive, Congress ought to denounce any penalty.

Of course, I understand that a complaint would have to be filed, but what would that complaint recite? It would merely recite but what would that complaint recite? It would merely recite the entering into a contract for the performance of certain work, the entering into a contract for the performance of certain work, and upon the plea of guilty being entered, the evidence showing that the contract was made and that the sailor in violation of the contract, under the terms of the section, deserted, then he would be guilty of the crime, and it would be discretionary with the judge to punish him by imprisonment.

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the Senator from California, if he will permit me, whether, if there is to be any imprisonment at all tolerated, which may be questionable, it should not be limited to those cases where the sailor has obtained moneys in advance, substantially under false pretenses.

stantially under false pretenses.

Mr. WHITE. I think so, but—
Mr. HILL. Not technically false pretenses, but in substance.
Mr. PERKINS. If my colleague will permit me, I will state that this very same bill makes it illegal to advance a sailor any money. I should like to ask if that is not making a felony out of a civil contract?

Mr. HILL. That is a different question.
Mr. PERKINS. Or a crime.
Mr. WHITE. Is the Senator from New York through?
Mr. HILL. I merely made the suggestion for your consider-

In view of the statement made by the Senator from New York, I will merely remark that if the sailor obtained money in the way of an advance, at the same time having made up his mind that he would not perform the obligation which he entered upon and comply with the agreement, and upon the faith of his promise to do the work the money was given to him, it would have all the elements of that turpitude which is involved in the crime called obtaining money under false pretenses, and would be indictable in some States even as larceny. I do not know but that the law now would reach such a case; certainly it ought to do so, I think. But the criticism upon the section is that the mere violation of the contract to do the work is made an offense punish-

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to call the Senator's attention to another fact, which I regard as important.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I know but little about navigation or sailors; but suppose a sailor who had signed a contract such as is provided for in this section should be suddenly taken ill, or some member of his family was taken ill, or there was some other excuse that all reasonable men would recognize as being a reasonable excuse for not rendering himself on board the vessel. Should not some provision be made for cases of that kind?

Mr. FRYE. The bill provides for a twenty-four hours' notice.

Mr. ALLEN. I know, but suppose he is taken sick within that Mr. FRYE. No court would imprison him, of course, if he were

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, the section is perhaps not amenable to that criticism, because it uses the word "neglect," and I take it if a person be detained by reason of illness or by any paramount cause which it would be im-reason of illness or by any paramount cause which it would be impossible for him to overcome, he could not be considered even technically guilty of contempt. I should think not.

Mr. ALLEN. But I construe the word "neglect" to be synonymous with "fail." "That he shall fail to render himself on board the vessel." It does provide for twenty-four hours notice, but suppose he is taken sick, or that some member of his family is taken with the shall bear and the state of the is taken sick, five or ten hours before he shall render himself on board the vessel, under such circumstances that he could not do so or ought not to desert his family.

Mr. WHITE. Of course there should be no ambiguity in this regard, if the Senator will permit me; but I hardly think that he could find any authority to the effect that "neglect" and "fail" are synonymous. Of course the neglect to come would involve the proposition that there had been a failure, but a failure to come would not mean that there had been any neglect, because in the case to which I refer I do not think that negligence could be predicated upon an absence over which the individual had no control.

Still that could be reached by an amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not know what American court is to pass upon this statute or what construction it will give to it, but I think the Senator can call to his mind many instances in which the words "neglect" and "fail" were evidently used by courts as

mr. WHITE. Very likely; but it is hardly accurate.

Mr. ALLEN. The purpose of the bill, of course, is to require the seaman to appear in fulfillment of his contract. He contract be absolutely and without condition to appear. Now, should it be merely left to the construction of a country justice, as my friend the junior Senator from California suggests, to determine whether he has neglected or not? Of course, a country justice is not supposed to know

Mr. WHITE. Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me? Will the Senator excuse me until I finish the sentence?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly; excuse me.

Mr. ALLEN. A country justice who lives out in the country, where there are but very few people, and where social and intellectual privileges are very limited, is not supposed to know much law. He is not supposed to have the enlarged opportunities and the intellectual field in which to roam at will that a justice or magistrate residing in a larger municipality has. Is this question to be left simply to his discretion, to his uneducated mind, to his untutored mind, I might say? We might put in some provision in the construction of which not even an ordinary country justice can

Mr. WHITE. I intended to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska when I last interrupted him as to whether an amend-ment interpolating the word "willfully" would not cover the

Mr. ALLEN. That would probably cover the whole question, so that the element of inability of the seaman to appear upon the Mr. WHITE. I have no doubt the Senator from Maine who has charge of the bill would accept an amendment to that effect.
Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to accepting it.
Mr. ALLEN. So it may become an issue in the trial?
Mr. FRYE. Yes.
Mr. ALLEN. Very well. Then

Mr. ALLEN. Very well. Then I move to insert the word willfully" before the word "neglect" wherever it occurs in the section

Does that cover it? Under the circumstances it strikes me that is not sufficient. Ordinarily, of course, the word "willfully" would help out a statute, but where the simple question is as to whether a man violates his contract and fails to serve or not, of course he does it willfully; he does it intentionally; he does it knowingly.

does it knowingly.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from New York will excuse me—
Mr. HILL. Therefore I do not think it helps him out.
Mr. HOAR. I suggest to the Senator from New York the words
"without reasonable cause." The whole matter is in the discretion of the court. The court would deal with that question.
Mr. HILL. That is a different thing. That might do.
Mr. ALLEN. I do not want the Senator from New York or the Senator from Massachusetts to understand that I acquiesce, so far as I am concerned in the penal portion of this section. I far as I am concerned, in the penal portion of this section. I shall at the proper time (and if this is the proper time, I do so now) move to strike out the lines which impose upon a seaman the penalty of imprisonment for failure to observe his contract.

Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, there is an amendment to that effect now before the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. That is an amendment to strike out?
Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir.
Mr. ALLEN. I will vote for that amendment.
Mr. HILL. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Mr. HILL. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Massachusetts, who made the further suggestion of the words "without reasonable cause." At first I thought that possibly it would answer the purpose. But will it? Is reasonable cause the illness of his family? He still can complete his contract; he still can go. Is it not leaving it open? If he wants to get married, is that a reasonable cause for him to violate his contract?

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from New York ought to know,

Mr. President.

Mr. HILL. That is the reason why I am asking the question—I might want to volunteer and enlist myself. What is a reasonable cause; some reasonable, sufficient excuse for violating the contract? He might become intoxicated, be arrested, and put in contract. He might become marketed, be arrested, and put in jail, and could not go. That might be held, perhaps, in Massachusetts a reasonable cause. He might be detained for some reason. Sickness would be a reasonable cause, but there is a large number of instances, like sickness in the family—something of that kind—which could not be strictly held to be a reasonable That is the question I suggested.

Mr. HOAR. I do not want to interfere with the pending bill, which my honorable friend from Maine is much better able to take care of than I am, and I merely made the suggestion thinking it might save debate. I suppose when you say that if a sailor neglects to return on board a ship at a given time he may be imprisoned, in the discretion of the court, not exceeding a month, if we have a decent magistracy, as we always have had and always I think shall have in this country, the man is pretty safe against being punished for one of those excuses which the common sense and common feeling of all mankind considers sufficient. So if it had said, "If the man shall neglect, he may be punished in so it it had said, "It the mai shall neglect, he may be published in the discretion of the court," and it turned out that his mother or his wife or his child were lying dead in his house or were sick with a dangerous illness, no judge would punish him for that neglect. Of course it would be willful neglect. The word "willful" would not help it, because it would be willful neglect if neglect at all. But if in addition to that you put in the words neglect at all. But if in addition to that you put in the words "without sufficient excuse," then the judge is compelled to pass on the question whether the thousand cases that may be supposed are a sufficient excuse, in addition to his having this discretion on the whole thing. Any judge whom I suppose fit to be a judge would say that any of the cases which have been suggested on the floor of the Senate would afford an ample excuse for not complying with a civil contract, and would act accordingly. If a judge can not be trusted in that case he can not be trusted in any case in which the life or property or liberty of a citizen is imperiled.

I remember an incident that I am sometimes reminded of when we are making such legal provisions to govern a case. A very brilliant and witty friend of mine, who was clerk of the Massachusetts house of representatives for a great many years, saw in a paper a statement that he was going to publish a treatise on par-liamentary law. He wrote a letter to the paper, in which he denied the statement; but he said if he did undertake such a work he would sum it up in a single sentence, "Never have an ass in the chair." I think that doctrine may be applied to these provisions regulating courts. If you have a donkey in the judicial seat nobody is safe, whatever law you pass, and if you have a sensible man in the judicial seat you are safe certainly with a law like

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say a word before the amendment is acted upon.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to put my amendment in a little different shape?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska proposes to change the language of the clause which the Senator from California has moved to strike out.

from California has moved to strike out.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to change section 2, in line 9, on page 25, section 4522, by striking out the word "neglect" and inserting the words "without reasonable cause fail;" in line 13, by striking out the word "neglect" and inserting the word "failure;" in line 17 by striking out the word "neglect" and inserting the word "fail;" in line 20, on page 26, by striking out the word "neglect" and inserting the words "fail without reasonable cause."

Mr. FRYE. I have no objection to any of these amondments.

Mr. FRYE, I have no objection to any of those amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that a part of the amendment now proposed relates to the text which the amendment offered by the Senator from California proposes to strike out. By unanimous consent all of the amendments suggested by the Senator from Nebraska can be considered as adopted, Mr. WHITE. Is not the Chair in error as to that? The words which the Senator from California [Mr. Perkins] moved to strike out I do not think were involved in the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Not at all.

Mr. PERKINS. Not at all. If the Secretary will refer to the amendment, he will see that I have simply proposed to strike out the imprisonment clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the amendments do not relate to that text, as the Chair supposed, then they will be postponed until after the amendment offered by the Senator from California shall have been disposed of; and the amendment offered by the Senator from California will now be stated.

The Secretary. In section 2 of the amendment reported by the committee, in line 23, on page 26, after the word "earned," it is proposed to strike out "and also, in the discretion of the court, he shall be liable to imprisonment for not more than one month."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain the amendments of the Senator from Nebraska when the amendment of the Senator from California shall have been disposed of.

Mr. FRYE. I understood they were all adopted by agreement.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to this matter. It is said that foreign countries have nothing of this kind. Great Britain has a law to-day that if a sailor signs the papers of a ship and then declines to serve on that ship the master may call on any policeman who is in view or who can be found to take the sailor and carry him on board the ship, put him in irons, and keep him there until the ship sails.

What are ships going to do without some such provision as this bill makes? You can not run a ship as you can a coach; you can not run a ship as you can a railroad. Here is a ship loaded for sea, the crew engaged, the papers signed. She is subject to a demurrage of hundreds of dollars a day for every day she is detained. A sailor having been brought and put on board of that ship, the next morning, without the slightest cause, leaves, and thus the ship is left without the requisite crew, and she is obliged to pay demurrage for every day she is detained. A storm may arise, and she may be delayed by head winds for a week, a fortnight, or three weeks. There is nothing of the kind about a coach; there is nothing of the kind about a railroad. I wish to say right here that I have had something to do with these sailors. There is a sailors' union in California which has had its attorney here for the last six years, and he is here now—a sailor. There is a sailors' union in Philadelphia; there is a sailors' union in New York. If Senators suppose that the sailors are not being taken care of, they are entirely mistaken. There is not a port where there is not a sailors' lawyer. The sailor has every advantage of the ship and every advantage of the shipmaster in any port into which a vessel may go. The ships are entitled to some consideration.

When the bill was pending two Congresses ago in the first place, I had conferences with these sailors and the sailors' unions. lasted over three or four days; Governor DINGLEY was with me; and we finally drew up that which seemed to satisfy the sailor from and we many drew up that which seemed to satisfy the sallor from California, and it was enacted into law. But there is no satisfying them without giving them the earth; you can not do it.

Mr. PERKINS. They do not want to be imprisoned.

Mr. FRYE. It is utterly impossible to satisfy them without giving them the earth. They still cry "Give!" after we have made them all these concessions. Taking this entire Congress, this bill has been under consideration for six months, and the sailors have had been increased and over again in our committee, and the ship. had hearings over and over again in our committee, and the shipowners have had their hearings. Finally shipowners and sailors undertook to get together and see if there could not be some agreement by which the condition of the sailor might be ameliorated. There is not a line in that bill, except this particular one, that is not for the amelioration of the condition of the sailor—not one. Wherever there was imprisonment before, and it was compulsory on the court to imprison, it has been made in the discretion of the court, and wherever the imprisonment was for four months before it is two months now, and where it was six months before it is three months now in that bill. In that bill there is provided a menu for these sailors almost equal to that which any hotel in the city of Washington furnishes. In every single item in that bill, except this single one, there is what the sailors have demanded, what they have prayed for, and what has been granted by the shipowners and by our committee, except as to the single matter of what they call "crimping."

Now, what is crimping? That will come up. The Senator, undoubtedly following his constituent from the sailors' union in California, will offer an amendment to that clause; I have no doubt about that; and then to the clause allowing $10 advance of wages. What is this matter of "crimping?" I might just as well spend time now on this subject as on another occasion. We have been trying for twenty years, and I have been trying my very best as chairman of the Committee on Commerce here and over in the House of Representatives, to do something for sailors, who very seldom do anything for themselves; few of them do, at who very sedom do anything for themserves, few of them do, avery any rate. We have placed them under guardianship, and in every conceivable way tried to protect them against whom? To protect them against boarding-house keepers. Every attempt that we have made in that direction has been a dead failure. We have had humanitarians, we have had Bethel ministers from New York and Bestern before our committee we have adopted their York and Boston before our committee, we have adopted their recommendations and enacted them into law for the benefit of sailors to save them from the boarding-house keepers, and we not saved a sailor from the boarding-house keeper. boarding-house keeper has just the same power and control of every sailor to-day that he had before we passed the law.

What is "crimping?" It is a bad name. It means simply that any captain of a ship needing sailors may employ an agent to go and hire them. That is "crimping." This bill provides that no man shall be permitted to go and hire a sailor until the Secretary of the Treasury has investigated his character and given him a certificate. Will the Secretary of the Treasury give a certificate to the boarding-house keeper into whose clutches the sailor falls? Not at all. That is for the benefit of the sailor; and yet the sailor demands, and the Senator from California will demand, that the "crimping" provided for in this bill shall be stricken out; yet you can not get sailors on the eastern coast without. It is utterly impossible. When one of these great liners comes in, where are the shipping masters to be found? In England they have them every few rods, with their shipping offices wide open, ready to receive the sailor, with notices posted all along the great corridors that a certain ship will sail on a certain day on a certain voyage, and any sailor who desires to join that ship may step into the shipping office and ship. You have nothing of that kind here, and you can not have on account of the distance from each other of the great ports of this country. Between us and them there is nothing like the same conditions.

Take a liner, and let her come to the city of New York with 400 hands on board. Perhaps she needs a hundred more hands, and is to sail within three days. How is she going to get them? The shipping master has no time to secure them, and up to the present time he has had not even an office. He has been a curb stone broker, and nothing more. This bill provides that they shall have offices furnished to them. The only way under the sun for the captain of that liner to get a crew is to hire a man to go out and hire a crew. If he can not employ any man except a man who has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, as matter of course the sailor is protected so far as he can be against the boarding-house keepers, because they will not be appointed to do this business—not at all.

There is a portion of the sailors of the United States just as intelligent, just as good, as industrious, as saving, as careful, as any laboring men in the United States or any other men. Those sailors do not require protection from boarding-house keepers; they do not go into boarding houses; they do not get drunk the moment they get on shore, and stay drunk until their money is entirely gone and the boarding-house keeper has got it, and they are ready to ship again. The man who needs the protection is the man who can not protect himself; and I have come to the deliberate conclusion, forced upon me by experience in this matter, that it is an utter impossibility to assume guardianship by the Government over a bodily and mentally sound man. You can not do it. If the sailor will not protect himself you can not protect him by law, and it is no use to try it. If he will get drunk when he goes on shore, he will go to the boarding house, the boarding-house keeper will keep him drunk until his money is all exhausted, and then, if you have no authorized agent to hire that caller and not him on board ship he is in the heard of the board. sailor and put him on board ship, he is in the hands of the board-ing-house keeper, and the boarding-house keeper will ship him, take every dollar out of him, and even the clothes he has on his back, and then he goes on board the ship and gets clothes. It is no use for Congress to undertake to deal with that matter senti-It has to face the existing condition of things

As to the coastwise trade, in order to take care of the sailors, we repealed the law which permitted their imprisonment. What was the result? Every once in a while a ship is held up and compelled to pay heavy demurrage because the crew which she shipped, and which agreed to go on her, refused to go after the ship's papers were signed. There was no punishment and no penalty, except the forfeiture of wages, and there were no wages to be forfeited. What does the forfeiture of wages amount to in the case of a ship that carries 20 sailors and has 4,000 tons of freight on board, bound for Liverpool? It is a bagatelle, utterly useless, of no account. for Liverpool?

In this bill we put that single provision for the benefit of the ships and the men who run the ships and for the benefit of commerce; and the Senator from California can not point to another item in that bill which is for the benefit of the ship and is not for the benefit of the sailor.

Mr. President, I hoped to have completed this bill to-night, but, judging from present conditions, I do not believe that it can be completed.

Mr. CALL. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Maine that it seems to me that the point to guard against in the matter of the protection of the sailor would be to see that he does not sign papers of the ship unless he is in a proper condition and under proper supervision.

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Florida must understand that the ship captain and the owners of the ship never know whether the sailor is in a proper condition when he signs the papers or not. They must be signed before the shipping commissioner, who is an officer of the United States, under oath to do his duty, and undoubtedly does his duty. There is where the papers are signed.

Mr. CALL. Then I understand that no other signature is binding except that made before an officer of the Government?

Mr. FRYE. No, sir. The man called the "crimp" simply makes a trade with the sailor to join such a ship. Undoubtedly he gets a dollar or two dollars from the captain of the ship for doing the work.

Mr. CALL. But the agreement is not binding unless made under the supervision of the Government officer?

Mr. FRYE. No; it is not. Mr. CALL. Is that officer required to see that the sailor is in a

Mr. CALL. There ought to be some provision of that kind.
Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Maine will permit me, he Mr. WHITE. If the Senator from Maine will permit me, he stated the law of England with reference to shipping masters and the power of a shipmaster. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has investigated the laws of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and also of Germany, in that regard, and what they are? I have heard statements that there was no penal provision whatever in those countries. I am not personally aware of the condition of the statutes of those nations.

Mr. FRYE. There is no penal provision in England. The law there simply provides that the captain of a ship may call on a police officer to take the sailor and put him in irons on board the ship, and there is no sailor in Christendom who would not rather have the discretion of the court as to thirty days' imprisonment than to be carried in irons and to be placed on board ship.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask the Senator if there is any doubt as to the duty of the shipping commissioner to refuse to allow a contract to be made with a man who is not in a condition to make it?

Mr. FRYE. Of course it is the duty of every intelligent officer to see that a man knows what he is about.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator seemed to be replying differ-Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator seemed to be replying differently to the Senator from Florida when he said the owner of the ship could not know what took place before the shipping commissioners. I do not know whether or not there are specific provisions of law which require the shipping commissioner to see, before he certifies a sailor's contract, that the sailor is not drunk or unfit to make a contract, but I do know, as a matter of common sense, that it is his duty, and that the shipping commissioner is provided for the very purpose of requiring that the contract shall be deliberately entered into by the seaman.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Maine or the Senator from California, whoever is entitled to the floor, yield for a brief execu-

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Maine or the Senator from California, whoever is entitled to the floor, yield for a brief executive session? It is evident that we can not conclude the bill to-night, and I will therefore move an executive session.

Mr. FRYE. One moment, if the Senator please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HILL. Certainly. Mr. FRYE. I do not think the Senator from California [Mr. Mr. FRYE. I do not think the Senator from California [Air. Perkins] had any purpose except a good one in offering his amendment, but I think that some of the discussion which has taken place has helped delay this bill so that another very important one can not come under consideration this afternoon. If it is true that any Senator has had that purpose, I hope the next time, if I shall ask unanimous consent, that no objection will be interposed to considering those bills. They are very important bills.

Mr. HILL. How many of them have we passed now?

Mr. FRYE. We have passed one, but there are four House bills

Mr. FRYE. We have passed one, but there are four House bills that ought to be in conference, and all four of them are very im-

Mr. HILL. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the Senator making a request to have the bills made special orders. Mr. HOAR. I think there is no objection to going on and passing the pending bill to-night.

Mr. FRYE. I should be compelled, if the vote was declared to be in favor of striking out that clause, to call for the yeas and nays, which would develop no quorum, and that would be the end of the bill.

Mr. WHITE. The yeas and nays will be called for in any event.
Mr. PERKINS. The Senator from Maine only does me justice when he says that he thinks I had no ulterior motive in offering the amendment. I am surprised myself at the tempest which has raged in a teapot on account of my moving to strike out— Mr. HILL. I object to the Senator calling the Senate "a tea-

Mr. HILL.

Mr. HILL. I object to the Senator calling the Senate "a teapot." [Laughter.]

Mr. FRYE. I was going to object to the same thing. I do notwant to be called that. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. I simply proposed to strike out a provision imprisoning a man for the violation of a civil agreement.

Mr. HILL. How did the Senator from California get the floor away from me?

away from me?

Mr. PERKINS. I will yield, but I want to say a word, if the Senator from New York will allow.

Mr. HILL. Yes.
Mr. PERKINS. I am going to offer half a dozen more amendments to the bill. If I had any doubts before, I know I am right in my position now.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from New York will allow me, I suggest that the Senator from Maine ask that the pending bill shall be made the unfinished business after the present unfinished business is out of the way.

Mr. FRYE. No; because if I can have my way, the Pacific funding bill will be the next unfinished business. I think it has funding bill will be the next unfinished business. I think it has waited long enough for a hearing.

Mr. HILL. Then these sailors will have to wait for some time.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will ask the Senator how he hopes to get another day in court for this bill?

Mr. FRYE. If the bill is to be amended as the Senator from California proposes, the Senator from Maine has no desire to have it considered any further—not the slightest.

Mr. CHANDLER. That can not be decided until there is a full Senate. How does the Senator from Maine propose to again bring this bill before the Senate if we await his pleasure on that subject?

Mr. FRYE. The Senator from Maine is not prepared just now to say.

Mr. BATE. The Senator from Maine promised us the other evening when he secured an agreement for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Commerce that there would not be any debate about them; and here we have had debate on one of the bills which has occupied all the evening.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HILL. I renew my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 11, 1897, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 7, 1897.

The House met at 12 o'clock m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D., Chaplain of the Senate

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CERTAIN OFFICERS, ALASKA TERRITORY.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of two House bills, which are dependent upon each other. Action upon one necessitates the passage of the other.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7087) to amend section 8 of the act entitled "An act providing a civil government for Alaska," approved May 17, 1884.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of an act entitled "An act providing a civil government for Alaska" be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words "the commissioner provided for by this act to reside in Sitka shall be ex officio receiver of public moneys, and the marshal provided for by this act shall be ex officio receiver of public moneys, and the marshal provided for by this act shall be ex officio surveyor-general of said district."

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, the next bill (H. R. 7088) should be considered in connection with the one which has just been read. considered in connection with the one which has just been read. One of them is a repealing act, which would leave the law imperfect without the passage of the other.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to have the report read.

Mr. LACEY. The report may be read, or I can make a brief explanation which I think will be satisfactory.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, let the second bill be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 7088) to create the office of surveyor-general in Alaska. Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a surveyor-general for the District of Alaska, embracing one surveying district.

SEC. 2. That the surveyor-general of Alaska shall receive a salary at the rate of $2,500 per annum.

The Committee on the Public Lands recommended an amendment striking out of line 2, in section 2, the words "five hundred."

Mr. LACEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, the report on the bill H. R.
7087 will explain the whole matter, or perhaps I can make it clear to the House in a briefer way.

Mr. DINGLEY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask the Clerk to read the report on the bill

H. R. 7087. The report (by Mr. LACEY) was read, as follows:

The report (by Mr. LACEY) was read, as follows:
The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7087) to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act providing a civil government for Alaska," approved May 17, 184, submit the following report:
Your committee recommend the passage of this bill for the reasons set forth in the annexed letters from the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior.
The bill was prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE, Washington, D. C., February 28, 1896.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE, Washington, D. C., February 28, 1896,

SIR: In my annual report for 1895, pages 62, 63, and 64, I set forth at some length the great importance and necessity for the enactment of a law creating the office of United States surveyor-general for Alaska.

This matter also formed the subject of a special remark in my reports for 1893 and 1894. The need for this office, in view of the development of the mining interests, is constantly increasing, and the duties devolving upon the ex officio surveyor-general, who is also the United States marshal, are such as to require his entire time in the former capacity.

I have therefore prepared a bill which is herewith inclosed, and urgently recommend that the same be introduced in both Houses of Congress under your sanction and approval.

I also transmit a draft of a bill repealing that portion of section 8 of the act of May 17, 1884 (23 Stat. L., p. 26), which provides that the commissioner, clerk, and marshal shall act as ex officio register, receiver, and surveyor-general, respectively.

Your attention is called to the fact that section 2234 of the Revised Statutes provides that a register and receiver shall be appointed for each land district established by law, and to the further fact that the first sentence in said section 8 (23 Stat. L., p. 26) provides "that said district of Alaska is hereby created a land district, and the United States land office for said district is hereby located at Sitka."

You will note that with that portion of said section 8 (23 Stat. L., p. 26), repealed, a register and receiver may be appointed for this district under said section 2234 of the Revised Statutes.

The necessity for this action is constantly brought to my notice, and, for the reason stated in my annual report for 1895, page 64, I am satisfied that the legislation asked will be in the interests of the public service.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, March 10, 1896.

Washington, March 10, 1896.

SIR: I have the honor to hand you herewith copies of two bills prepared by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, one of which creates the office of surveyor-general in Alaska, and the other seeks to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act providing a civil government for Alaska," approved May 17, 1894 (23 Stat. L., page 25). I also transmit herewith a copy of the Commissioner's letter, dated the 28th ultimo, submitting said bills for my consideration.

I know of no reason why the bills should not be enacted into law.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH. Secretary

HOKE SMITH, Secretary,

Hon. John F. Lacey, Chairman Committee on the Public Lands, House of Representatives.

Mr. DINGLEY. I should like to ask the gentleman if the effect of the passage of these two bills is to create three new offices, namely, surveyor, receiver, and register?

Mr. LACEY. The effect of the bill is to create one new office, namely, a surveyor-general, at a salary of $2,000 a year. At present the other parties perform the duties of register and receiver and receive the compensation. There will be no extra expense on and receive the compensation. There will be no extra expense on account of that. The only expense added to the administration of affairs in Alaska will be the $2,000 for surveyor-general.

Mr. DINGLEY. Twenty-five hundred dollars.

Mr. LACEY. No; $2,000. There is an amendment proposed to strike out the $500; and the increased business in opening up that country for settlement will more than pay this expense. It will be not account the strike of the property be an asset rather than a liability, in my judgment. ment has asked this relief for several years.

Mr. DINGLEY. And the committee are satisfied that the creation of this officer, the surveyor-general, is absolutely necessary for the protection of the public interest?

Mr. LACEY. Unquestionably so. The marshal is now required to perform the duties of that office, without being qualified to do

Mr. DINGLEY. Does he receive the compensation?
Mr. LACEY. He receives the compensation.
Mr. McMILLIN. We are unable to hear the gentleman's state-

Did the gentleman hear the report read?

Mr. McMILLIN. I heard the report read.

Mr. LACEY. I was only explaining, Mr. Speaker, that the only additional expense would be the salary of the surveyor-general. The marshal now receives the fees of that office, which are about enough to pay the surveyor-general. Practically it will involve no expense, and it will facilitate the transaction of the land business there. There is quite a settlement opening up in Alaska, and large mining interests are being developed in that country.

Mr. McMILLIN. Have the duties of the office increased to that

Mr. MCMILLIN. Have the duties of the office increased to that degree that they can not be properly performed by those upon whom they were devolved by the original act?

Mr. LACEY. The original act requires double duty on the part of the marshal. It is reported to us from the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the marshal can not perform these duties satisfactorily.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman if this is the same bill that was considered last session?

Mr. LACEY. It has never been considered. It was reported, but never considered.
Mr. RICHARDSON. Does this provide for the representation of the Territory?

Mr. LACEY. It is nothing but a land bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman will remember that we

Mr. McCharleson, The general will remember the had the other bill pending last session. It is not that, is it?
Mr. LACEY. It is not that bill.
Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I would like to ask the tleman if this opens the lands of Alaska to settlement? Is any change in the existing land laws of that Territory? I would like to ask the gen-Is there any change in the existing land laws of that Territory?

Mr. LACEY. There is no change whatever. This is simply to carry out the existing law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the two bills reported to the House? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill H. R. 7087.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and pas The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the next bill. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7088) to create the office of surveyor-general in Alaska.

The SPEAKER. To this the committee reports an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 2, line 2, after the word "thousand," strike out the words "five hundred;" so as to read "at the rate of $2,000 per annum."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LACEY, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the several bills were passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POWERS. I call for the regular order. The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question before I give consent. I understand the views written by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell] have been exhausted also. I think we ought to have a reprint.

Mr. POWERS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that in consequence of the fact that this bill in its terms provides that it should take effect on the 1st of January, 1897, it will be necessary to reprint the bill; and I propose when the committee rises to ask a reprint of the bill, making the necessary changes to conform to the change of dates.

Mr. RICHARDSON. And will you include with that request that there be a reprint of the views written by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell]? Mr. POWERS.

Mr. POWERS. I will, with a great deal of pleasure.
Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, there is one matter to which I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is, whether there is objection to dispensing with the reading of the bill? [After a pause.]

The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont a question. I have a substitute which I have prepared and which I desire to offer and have voted upon, and I would ask him if he would not be willing to have an order made to have it printed at the same time? Will you include that in your

Mr. POWERS. I will include that in my request when the committee rises this afternoon.

Now, Mr. Chairman, by an understanding had with the members of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, the time for debate is to be equally divided between the friends and the opponents of this bill; and the same understanding contemplates that I shall control the time on behalf of the majority, and that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard] shall control the time on the part of the minority. I ask unanimous consent that that understanding be confirmed by an order of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time for general debate be divided equally between the two sides, the affirmative to be controlled by the gentleman from Vermont and the negative by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, in opening the discussion upon this question, which I think the House will soon perceive is the most important question that will come before us for consideration at this session, I shall endeavor to address myself to the canto be equally divided between the friends and the opponents of

If there be any attempt during the progress of this debate to make appeals to the prejudices of men, the opponents of this bill will have a monopoly of that privilege. It is a straight, simple, business proposition that we intend to submit to the consideration of the House. It is a proposition in the consideration of which an appeal is to be made to the judgment of the members of this House as candid men. Very likely I can best serve the purpose that I am charged at this Very likely I can best serve the purpose that I am charged at this time with forwarding by calling attention for a few moments to the history of this Pacific railroad legislation, and, before going further, I would say that if any gentleman should desire to submit to me any inquiries he will receive a more elaborate and intelligent answer if he will be kind enough to withhold them until I shall have concluded the main part of my remarks, because interruption will break the continuity of the story, and I think a more useful purpose will be served, and it will be more satisfactory to those who seek information in good faith, if they will make a note of any questions they desire to put and submit them when I shall have concluded my remarks.

In 1862 begins the history of this great enterprise of constructing a railroad from the waters of the Missouri to the waters of the Sacramento in California. Many men, who had been called visionaries by the public, had, before 1862, advanced the theory that it was possible to build such a railroad, but none of those theories took form or shape until the war broke out in 1861, and the Administration then in power discovered that there was a sort the Administration then in power discovered that there was a sort of wavering loyalty to the American flag on the Pacific Coast, and, for patriotic reasons, desired the construction of a transcontinental railroad, an object which the people of California and of that section of country had long hoped for and that many men had had fond anticipations would some time be accomplished. The opportunity was a favorable one, but still you are to remember that the country was then in the very throes of the greatest wave of product times.

Notwithstanding all the obstacles that were presented by the condition of things then existing, the promoters of this enterprise, backed by an indulgent consideration on the part of Congress, set their faces toward the completion of this great work, and in a short time thereafter were enabled to see the full fruition of In 1862 the promoters of this enterprise came and their hopes. knocked at the doors of Congress for a charter and for such substantial aid as the magnitude of the work seemed to demand. It was plain to everybody that private capital could not accomplish the desired result and that Government aid must be obtained; and thereupon Congress, listening with a willing ear to this appeal, in view of the considerations to which I have already referred. passed the act of July 1, 1862, by which the Union Pacific Railroad Company was chartered and endowed with all the usual franchises of a railroad corporation, with power to construct a railroad from the Missouri River on the east to the Pacific Ocean on west. At the same time, and as part of the same act, Congress endowed the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, a corporation created by the legislature of that State, with the same Federal franchises that were conferred upon the Union Pacific Company. That is to say, instead of incorporating a distinct company for the western end of the proposed line, they took an existing corporation, which they had a perfect right to do, and endowed it with the additional Federal functions which would enable it to build this railroad not only through California, but also through the intervening territory between California and the Missouri River.

The act of 1862 provided that the two companies, the Union Pacific Company and the Central Pacific Company of California, should have, as substantial aid for the building of their respective portions of the road, a magnificent land grant of each alternate section of land on either side of the line for a distance of 10 miles—5 sections for every 10 miles. These lands were granted to these two corporations for the purpose of enabling them to construct the railroad which the Government so much desired. In addition to that, Congress gave to these companies a subsidy, as it is termed and will be termed in this discussion. sidy consisted of this, that the Government should issue thirty-year 6 per cent bonds and deliver them to the companies as fast as they completed the several sections of the road.

The act of 1862 provided that on the completion of a section of 40 miles of road and upon proof of that fact being made to the Secretary of the Treasury he should issue to the company, per mile, the subsidy bonds in the ratio provided in the act. That ratio was that in the open country between the Missouri and the foothills of the Rocky Mountains the subsidy should be at the rate of $16,000 per mile. I call attention specifically to the fact rate of $16,000 per mile. I call attention specifically to the fact that this subsidy was granted by the mile, and not as an entire amount. It was a subsidy by the mile upon completed sections of the railroad, and nothing else. The act further provided that in crossing over the Rocky Mountains, and also in crossing over the Sierras on the California end, the subsidy of $16,000 per mile should be tripled, making $48,000 per mile, and that between the Rockies and the Sierras, where the work of construction was more difficult than on the outside ends of the line, the subsidy should difficult than on the outside ends of the line, the subsidy should be twice the original amount, or $32,000 per mile. That was the magnificent grant, the splendid aid, which the Government of the United States rendered toward the completion of this great national highway.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is important for us to remember that to-day the building of a transcontinental line of railroad from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean is not a difficult work. We look upon it in the light of the past history of railroad building, and we see that four or five of these great transcontinental lines have been built. But when you go back to 1862 you find that this was looked upon as an almost impossible venture. The debates which were had here in Congress demonstrate that not one man in three had at that time the slightest idea that a road across what was then supposed to be the Great American Desert could be built, or that engineering skill was adequate to the task of mastering the summits of the Rocky and the Sierra mountains. But it was done. Looking at it from the standpoint of the men who took this work in hand, it is not strange that in spite of the great patri-otic purpose which the Administration had in view at that timethe demand for the construction of this road for the public goodthere was still great hesitation at the almost impassable obstacles that presented themselves to the promoters of this enterprise.

But these companies went forward. Under the act of 1862 they endeavored to enlist private capital in the enterprise. But it looked so chimerical—it looked to business men so practically absurd—that very little money was raised, and the scheme seemed to be paralyzed from the start. So those men came back to Congress in 1864 and said to the members of both Houses: "We can not raise the processory contint not raise the necessary capital to construct these railroads; we are hampered by the fact that the Government itself, under the act of 1862, is to have a bottom mortgage on the railroad; we can not raise money ourselves to build the road. But we ask you to permit these companies to place upon the road a first mortgage underlying the claim of the Government; and with the sale of the bonds and the proceeds of that mortgage, plus the aid that is to be rendered by the Government, we can assure Congress that the road can be constructed.

In 1864 Congress had the same patriotic ardor for the construc-tion of these roads that it had in 1862. It very readily, therefore, granted this request, and the distinctive characteristic of the leg-islation of 1864 is the fact that the Government stepped back one pace in the lien which it was to impose on these roads and the securities for the repayment of the subsidy which had been given them, and allowed the companies themselves to place beneath the mortgage of the Government a mortgage of prior obligation upon which they could realize money for the prosecution of this enter-

Now, those two acts—the act of 1862 and the act of 1864—contain the charters of the Union and Central Pacific railroads, so far as the provisions of these charters are important for us to consider to-day. The whole legislation is there found, and it is readily accessible to members. It is embraced in the report of the Commissioner of Railroads for 1895, and this is accompanied with the digest of the decisions of the Supreme Court on this sub-ject. In passing, I may say that from the time this legislation was enacted down to this day various questions have arisen between the Government and these companies, and all necessary information on this subject is comprised in a nutshell in the report of the Commissioner of Railroads for 1895.

Now, the Supreme Court has decided that under this legislation the security of the Government rests upon that portion of the railroad line that was actually aided by the Government. As everybody knows, the Union Pacific Railroad is now or was until recently a great system of railroad lines embracing nearly 8,000 miles, whereas the original line as projected under the legislation of 1862 and 1864 embraced only about 1,800 miles. The Central Pacific Railroad of California, as it existed under the original legislation, embraced only the line from Ogden, in the State of Utah, to San Jose, in the State of California, a distance of about 860 miles; but to-day the Central Pacific system embraces a large number of additional lines that have been brought into it by pur-Chase and by new construction.

But before I go any further, I desire to call the attention of the House for a moment to the geography of this situation. When the legislation of 1862 was first proposed, there arose an earnest contention between different towns on the Missouri River for the eastern terminus of the road. In fact, there were as many towns and cities contending for that terminus as contended for the honor of the birthplace of Homer. Sioux City (then a trading post up in the northern part of Iowa), Omaha (or Council Bluffs, on the opposite side of the river), Atchison, Leavenworth, Kansas City, and other towns were thus contending. By reason of this fact the friends of the measure itself were divided into factions, each body of the friends of the road clamoring for the locality in their own particular section. Such things, perhaps, are in accord with the judgment and observation of members here as to what human nature is in this world. The result was that Congress, in order to compose this difficulty and to quiet this contention, provided that the starting point upon the Union Pacific Railroad should be on the one hundredth meridian of longitude. Instead of starting on the Missouri River, they went away out 394 miles into Kansas and 250 miles or some such distance into Nebraska, to the one hundredth meridian, and provided that the line of road should start at that common point. They also provided that from that point—the one hundredth meridian—branch lines should be constructed to all these contending cities and towns. Thus everybody's desire was met, and the railroad became an accomplished

When, however, they came to construct the road, it soon became apparent that all these branch lines were uncalled for. To make a long story short, and without going into a recital of the various legislation that was had on the subject, I may say that it all came down at last to this: The main line of the Union Pacific Railroad started from Omaha, in the State of Nebraska, and ran west to Og-den, in the State of Utah. Here is the line traced by this black line on the map. [Illustrating.] Another branch of the main line started from Kansas City and ran west to the one hundredth meridian, a distance of 394 miles. Practically, the distance is a few rods less than that, but that statement is near enough. So that the Union Pacific Railroad when constructed consisted of its main line from Omaha to Ogden and the lower line from Kansas City running 394 miles west. And, Mr. Chairman, in that connection, I would say to the committee that this lower line to which I have just called your attention is the old Kansas corporation known as the Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western Railroad. They had a charter from the Territorial legislature of Kansas authorizing them to build a Pacific railroad. Congress, in the act of 1862, provided that that road should be a part of the Union Pacific system; that it should participate in the subsidy and in the land grant as well as any other portion of the main line of road.

The black line on this map, to which I have called your attention, indicates that portion of the Union Pacific system that was subsidized by the Government of the United States-that portion of the road which received Government aid.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact Now, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the bond-aided portion of the upper line began at a point about 3½ miles west of the bridge across the Missouri River, that initial point having been fixed by the President of the United States, and that the aid only extends to a point 3½ miles west of this Omaha Bridge. On the lower line, or the Kansas City line, this portion of the railroad entitled to the subsidy and covered by the mortgage begins at a point one-half mile distance from the union station at Kansas City, and, as I have already stated, runs out a distance of some 394 miles. That, in short, is the story of the legislation and the geographical routes of the roads as well as the part of the line that is covered by the subsidy.

In 1864 Congress relieved the Union Pacific Company of any obligations to build the road to Sioux City. Afterwards another company took it and built the road down the east side of the Missouri River to a point about 100 miles distant, and there crossed the river and joined the main line at Fremont, in Nebraska, I think, if I am correct in the name; and that was aided by the Government. So also was the Central Branch of the Union Pacific. The various towns, as I have shown, were contending for the road, and it was provided that what is known as the Central Pacific Branch, midway between the upper and lower branches of the Union Pacific, should be granted aid for a distance of 100 miles, but it terminated at that point. So much for the Union Pacific.

Now, the Central Pacific Railroad started originally as a California corporation. They were authorized by the act of Congress of 1862 and the act of 1864 to continue the construction of their road not only to the western line of Nevada—the limit of the State line—but also to enable them to build eastwardly until they met the Union Pacific, which was being constructed westward. That is the story in brief of the beginning of the construction of these

It is easy to see, Mr. Chairman, that with this magnificent land grant given to the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific system, as well as the subsidy granted to each, it became a question of rivalry between them as to which should get the largest share. It became a race of diligence between the Central road, building from the west, and the Union Pacific, from the east, to see which could get the most of this grant by the Government, because the land grant and the subsidy were paid to both of them by the mile, and the more miles that any road could get in, the more land and the more subsidy it would be entitled to. The result of it was that these roads built right by each other in the vicinity of Salt Lake for a distance of about 80 miles, which was graded by the Central Pacific east of Ogden, the present terminus of the road; and the Union Pacific had shot by where the work of the Central Pacific was going on; and then each of the roads came to Congress claiming the land grant and subsidy for the additional mileage thus constructed. Congress settled the matter by the act passed in 1869, which provided that the point of junction between the two roads should be at a certain point about 5 miles west of Ogden. could get the most of this grant by the Government, because the two roads should be at a certain point about 5 miles west of Ogden.

This diligence resulted in another strange fact. Under the legislation of 1864 the roads had up to July 1, 1876, to complete the line, a distance of more than 2,000 miles. They had to cross the Rocky Mountains, the Sierras, as well as to traverse the great intervening arid space between the two. But this race of diligence enabled these companies, under the most formidable obstacles, to haid the complete reads to the satisfaction of the Government. build the complete roads to the satisfaction of the Government; and they were accepted by the Government on the 10th day of May, 1869, four years after they had struck the first blow in the

Now, why did the Government want these roads built? I will show you. They were paying for the transportation of the mails overland to California, as well as to other points on the Pacific coast, a sum total of between seven and eight million dollars a year. After the roads were built this was cut down from $8,000,000 a year to a little over $1,000,000. They were compelled, before the building of the roads, to incur very heavy expense in the transportation of their supplies for the Indian agencies, their munitions of war, their troops, and other matters of freight. By the building of this road they were enabled to cut down this expense in an equally large ratio.

Not only that. Prior to the building of these roads that great and almost boundless empire that lies between these two ranges of mountains, with millions of public lands for sale, was practically cut out from the world. No man wanted to go there and settle, and therefore no man would buy an acre of that land. But by pushing this line of railroad through it opened these lands to sale and to settlement, and thousands and millions of inhabitants are and to settlement, and thousands and millions of innabitants are to-day living in that region that was opened up by the enterprise of these men that had this matter in charge. And I may say right here in passing, that if the Government of the United States should lose every dollar of its indebtedness against these companies, should make a free gift of it, it could still credit the companies and itself with more than ten times as much in dollars and cents as it has ever expended in the construction of these roads. Why, the building of this Union Pacific through Nebraska and Kansas has strung together towns and cities like beads, and has carried civilization out through that country and across the Rockies, through its open portals to that great plain beyond; and we to-day are enjoying the blessings of it, not least among which is the presence on this floor of the genial gentlemen from Colorado and Utah, and Nevada, and other States out there that we should never probably have heard of had it not been for the building of this road. It opened up the great silver-mining industries of the country. Colorado, Utah, and Nevada were opened up, and the mines of that country were worked. Why, we never should have heard of a free-silver party if it had not been for the opening up of that country. I do not know that that is any argument in support of the passage of this bill. [Laughter.]

Now, in short, this is the way in which the Government got into this fix. The Government away back, under the act of 1862, undertook to secure to itself the payment of these subsidy bonds, and the plan which they then adopted, in the light of the facts then existing, was undoubtedly a safe one to calculate upon. They provided that the issue of these subsidy bonds upon the completion of each 40 miles of railroad—the delivery of these bonds to the companies-should ipso facto create a statutory lien upon that section of road, and to secure payment they provided that this statutory lien should be a first lien, and that the roads, in addition to that security, should pay into the Treasury of the United States a sum of money equal to 5 per cent of its net earnings after the road was constructed. It was supposed that this 5 per cent of the net earnings would be sufficient to meet the current obligations of the Government as they matured

At that time, as you will remember, this was the only line in contemplation. Nobody dreamed that the Atlantic and Pacific, the Texas Pacific, the Northern Pacific, the Canadian Pacific, or three or four other competing lines that have since been built, would ever be constructed. Everybody supposed that all the freight and all the passengers that were moved between the East and the West were to go over this line and that the business therefore would be immense. But in the progress of time, these promoters having demonstrated that a road could be built over the Rockies, other men interested themselves in competing lines, and Rockies, other men interested themselves in competing lines, and in a very short time four or five of these lines have been constructed. Therefore the receipts of these two companies have been lessened by that active competition on the part of other lines. We are not to say that the Congress of 1862 acted in a short-sighted manner, because as things then appeared to them it was doubtless a sound piece of reasoning to say that the 5 per cent of the net earnings of these companies paid into the sinking fund would pay off this indebtedness in the end.

Now, matters ran along in this way until 1878. Mind you, the road was finished in 1869 and accepted by the Government. The Government, indeed, during the whole progress of construction had its commissioners to inspect the work as it went along, week by week, month by month, and year by year, and if there was any criticism to be made, those commissioners had the right to point it out to these companies and have any wrong corrected. But the work was accepted.

It was soon seen, after the roads started in and these other competing lines were projected and completed, that the provision made under the legislation of 1862 and 1864 would be insufficient

The Supreme Court of the United States had meantime decided The Supreme Court of the United States had meantime decided that the interest upon the subsidy bonds was not due from the companies until the maturity of the bonds. The provision in the statute is that the bonds shall be issued running thirty years, the interest thereon payable semiannually, and that these companies should meet and pay that interest. But the court says, and I think it is a unanimous opinion, that under the language used in that enactment the interest upon the subsidy bonds paid by the Government could not be taken from the company until the principal of the debt matured. And the result of that is the interest has been accumulating against these companies, and to-day we are confronted with a vast amount of unpaid interest, as well as the balance of principal.

the balance of principal.

In 1878 this matter was again taken in hand by Congress, and Judge Thurman, then a Senator from the State of Ohio, prepared and secured the passage of a bill known as the Thurman Act, the essential provisions of which, so far as this question is concerned, are these: That instead of paying into the Treasury 5 per cent of its net earnings, which upon an actual experience had proved to be insufficient, the Thurman Act provides that there shall be 25 per cent of the net earnings paid in. I ought to have said, in passing, what the two acts of 1862 and 1864 provides. The act of 1862 provided that the whole amount of the indebtedness from the Government to the railroads for the transportation of mails, for the ernment to the railroads for the transportation of mails, for the transportation of its troops, and for other purposes, should be retained by the Government.

In 1864 Congress modified that by providing that of these transportation charges only one-half should be retained in the Treasportation. ury and the other half paid to the company. You observe that the Government thus was one of the very best customers of these roads. It had to pay these roads an enormous sum, and they took care to provide in the act itself that they should not be charged any higher rate than that charged private individuals for similar sarving. similar service. These transportation charges, which were enormous in amount, were to be retained, under the act of 1862, altogether in the Treasury; under the act of 1864 one-half only, and under the act of 1878, the Thurman Act, the whole was to be retained, but one-half of it should be applied to the current interest on the subsidy bonds, and the other half go to the sinking fund, the theory of the Thurman Act being that one-half of its fund, the theory of the Thurman Act being that one-half of its transportation charge, plus some other reserve, would take care of the current interest on these bonds, and the sinking fund itself would at the maturity of the bonds be large enough, if well invested, to take care of the principle.

Now, I will restate these propositions, because it is a pretty important piece of arithmetic. Under the act of 1862 the security retained by the Government was a first mortgage on the road, plus 5 per cent of the net earnings and the whole transportation charges; under the act of 1864 the security of the Government was a second mortgage on the road, plus 5 per cent of the net earnings and one-half the transportation charges; under the Thurman Act of 1878 the security of the Government was 25 per cent of the net of 1878 the security of the Government was 25 per cent of the net earnings, made up in this way: First, the transportation charges that the Government would be owing to the road as a debtor; second, 5 per cent of the net earnings; third, such a proportion of the ond, 5 per cent of the net earnings; third, such a proportion of the aggregate sum of $1,200,000 in the case of the Central Pacific, and $800,000 in the case of the Union Pacific, should be paid into the Treasury of the United States, which with the other two reservations, transportation charges, and 5 per cent, would aggregate in the whole 25 per cent of their net earnings.

Now, if I have not made myself understood on that proposition, I desire that some gentleman advise me of the fact, because it is an important consideration.

Now, then, Indee Thurman, in one of the most claberate 2:

Now, then, Judge Thurman, in one of the most elaborate dis-cussions of this question that has ever been made in its entire his-Now, then, Judge Intiman, in one of the most elaborate discussions of this question that has ever been made in its entire history, practically demonstrated, as the reader will see, the facts that his provision amply secured the repayment of this money. Why did it fail? Why, it failed, Mr. Chairman, just as many times the best laid plans of men as well as mice fail. The reduction in the rates of transportation was a very important contributing factor to bring about this result. The freight rates from the east to the west have been going down, down, down, as time advanced, to such a point that they hardly pay the charge made necessary by that transportation. This, however, is not peculiar to the history of these roads. It is peculiar to the history of all railroads in this country. How many of these roads have gone into the hands of receivers from the same cause exactly? Not only that, but the Government itself has divided this patronage with the Pacific roads. Instead of sending all its freight, all its transportation business over this line, the child of its own creation, the child that it should nourish and encourage, especially if it expected a repayment of its debt, it has divided its patronage. Some of it has gone to the Central Pacific, much of it to the Santa Fe, and much of it has gone to the other roads, thereby reducing Fe, and much of it has gone to the other roads, thereby reducing the receipts in the treasury of the company, and to a corresponding degree the receipts in the Treasury of the United States have necessarily been cut down.

But that is no fault of the railroads. It was a wise policy that promoted the building of these other lines. Other sections of this country needed opening and development as well as that central portion, and therefore the Government was wise in encouraging it, and no man has a right to criticise that policy; but the necessary result of it was to diminish the earning capacity of these roads which the Government itself had assisted in building, and therefore that policy contributed very largely to bringing the road therefore that policy contributed very largely to bringing the road into its present insolvent condition.

The Thurman Act was based upon the theory that Government money was worth 5 per cent interest, and if that theory had proved correct, no doubt the Thurman Act would have worked out the result anticipated by its author. But instead of the Government borrowing money at 5 per cent interest, it can borrow at a rate nearer to 2 per cent, and this appreciation in the credit of our Government, which ought to thrill with pleasure the heart of every patriotic American, has also contributed very largely to the disastrons result which has overtaken these roads. disastrous result which has overtaken these roads.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman from Vermont advocate the passage of this bill on the ground that the management of the companies has been such that they have paid to the Government all that judicious and proper management would have enabled them to pay?

Mr. POWERS. I do; and I might as well come right to that point now as at any other time. My friend from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] was a member of the Committee on Pacific Railroads two years ago, and I know what his views are. His views are that the promoters of these railroads are a set of rascals, that they that the promoters of these railroads are a set of rascals, that they have got rich, and that they ought to disgorge and pay off this debt themselves. Now, if they have got rich out of the United States of America, I say amen to his proposition. But if, on the other hand, they have discharged every obligation they were under to the Government and have got rich from other sources, I say it is none of our business. I say that men who will build a railroad through snow banks 35 feet deep, and who will shed over miles of a railroad so that they can go on through the storms of winter and complete their road and operate it, men who undertook an entercomplete their road and operate it, men who undertook an enterprise that nobody had any faith in when they started upon it, ought to get rich if they succeed in accomplishing what people generally supposed to be an impossible task. I do not mean that they ought to get rich out of the Government, but if in the exer-display ought to get rich out of the Government, but if in the exercise of their wits they get rich I say that is their business.

Mr. BOATNER. The gentleman from Vermont—

Mr. POWERS. I decline to yield further, Mr. Chairman. I would yield to the gentleman, but I know he is going to have time in this debate, so that he will have full opportunity to advocate his side of the question.

Let me suppose a practical case by way of illustration. Let me suppose a practical case by way of illustration. The Government has been engaged for several years past in building in this city the most magnificent Library building on the face of the earth. I think it was Mr. Batterson, of Connecticut, who took the contract for that work. My friend from Connecticut [Mr. Hill] nods his assent. Mr. James G. Batterson, of Connecticut, took the contract to construct that Library for $6,000,000, a large sum of money. The Government made its plans and specifica-tions and said to Mr. Batterson: "If you will go ahead and con-tions and said to Mr. Batterson: "If you will go ahead and construct that building we will pay you six millions."

Now, suppose that Mr. Batterson made a net profit of $2,000,000 npon the work, is that any reason why he should be called upon to "disgorge" those two millions? Is it any reason why we should mark him down as a "rascal" because he has succeeded by his wit, by his enterprise, by his intelligence, in making a handsome profit on the job? Certainly not. The Government said to these Pacific road companies: "Gentlemen, we want a line of railroad constructed from the Missouri River to the Pacific Coast; we want to open up our great possessions between the two great ranges of to open up our great possessions between the two great ranges of mountains; we want to lessen the cost of transporting supplies and munitions of war across the continent, and supplies for the Indians to the interior of our country; we want a cheaper mode of transportation. If you will take all the risk and peril of building the road and will construct it to our satisfaction, we will give ing the road and will construct it to our satisfaction, we will give you so much money, we will give you such and such a land grant, and we will lend you each $33,000,000 by way of subsidy, which you may repay according to the terms of contract. If these conditions are acceptable to you, go on and build the road."

Now, if those companies went on and built the road, what man is there outside of a lunatic asylum who will say that they have got rich out of the Government? They have gotten out of the Government just exactly what the Government contracted to give them; no more. Not only that, but under the provisions of the acts of 1862 and 1864, as well as the Thurman Act of 1878, they have paid into the Treasury of the United States, notwithstanding the fact that the Union Pacific Company during the last three years has been in the hands of a receiver, every dollar that the years has been in the hands of a receiver, every dollar that the Government required of them. Not a cent has been defaulted. Where, then, is the ground for saying, as my friend from Louisiana [Mr. Boatner] will say when he comes to discuss this question, that the men who built this railroad ought to "disgorge" and pay this debt themselves? They are nothing but stockholders and pay this debt themselves? They are nothing but stockholders in a railroad company. If any of you gentlemen are stockholders in an insolvent bank, do you pull out your own pocketbooks and pay its debt, or do you insist that the bank itself must pay?

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. POWERS. I decline to be interrupted, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BOATNER. Well, if the gentleman declines to be interrupted, I beg him not to undertake to state what I am going to say. [Laughter.] Mr. POWERS.

Mr. POWERS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I know what the gentle-man is going to say. [Laughter.] We might just as well under-stand it now as at any other time. Now, I repeat, these railroad companies have discharged every obligation which they were under to the Government, and you are to note, gentlemen, that the obligations imposed upon these roads were imposed by you. Your predecessors, who occupied these seats, imposed the obliga-Your predecessors, who occupied these seats, imposed the obliga-tions. They fixed the requirements to which the companies should be held. They provided that the companies should pay so much into the Treasury every year, and if it was not enough you might just as well scold about your predecessors here as to scold about the companies, and you might do it more reasonably, because the company had no voice in fixing the obligation. The Congress of the United States, the supreme power, fixed that requirement at its own will, and usually the companies had no voice in the mat-ter. If they fixed it at too low a sum, we must simply scold about ter. If they fixed it at too low a sum, we must simply scold about the faulty judgment of our predecessors. We all know that there never was a Congress assembled on this continent that was so wise, so pure, and so handsome as the present Congress. [Laughter.]

They fulfilled all those obligations. What has been the result?

Why, gentlemen, the result of those requirements exacted of those companies has been this, that the Union Pacific Railroad Company has actually paid into the Treasury $5.000.000 more than the total amount of the subsidy bonds originally granted to them. I reiterate that statement: The Union Pacific has returned to the Treasury of the United States the total principal of the subsidy bonds issued to it plus $5,000,000, and the Central Pacific has returned into the Treasury under those various requirements a sum that lacks only about $10,000,000 of the amount originally granted to that read granted to that road.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Will the gentleman state the whole amount paid in?

Mr. POWERS. I will give those figures in a few moments. will state, however, that they appear in the report of the majority of the committee.

So that these railroad companies have actually returned to the United States Treasury all the money that was originally granted to them, less about $5,000,000. That leaves, therefore, this difference of $5,000,000, plus the accrued interest; and that is the most important item of the whole; that is the subject-matter of this proposed legislation.

Now, without taking more time on this branch of the subject, I will go at once to the provisions of the bill which the majority of this committee have proposed for your consideration.

Mr. CORLISS. If the gentleman will allow a question, I would like him to state, before he proceeds further, what the indebtedness of these roads to the Government was at the time the roads were practically completed.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman will find those figures in the majority report; but I may as well call attention to them now.

I should say that the report to which I now refer was made up at the last session of Congress, and therefore it is six months short in the computations of interest that should be allowed. I make this explanation so that gentlemen may not be misled. I have, however, in my desk a statement, which I may as well now refer to, of the exact amount of this indebtedness as it will be on the to, of the exact amount of this indebtedness as it will be on the 1st day of July next. As I have already said, the bill under consideration was prepared last winter. Its terms contemplate that it shall go into effect on the 1st day of January, 1897. That time having passed, it is necessary to revise the bill, substituting July for January at the appropriate places in the bill.

On the 18th of last December, after it was understood that this bill was to be brought up at this time for consideration. I wrote to the Transpary Department asking for a computation of the appropriate places.

the Treasury Department, asking for a computation of the amount of the debt of both these roads as well as the amount of the sinking fund applicable to them. I have here a letter of Mr. Curtis, the Assistant Secretary, transmitting this statement. The actual amount due, I will say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Conlines], on the 1st day of next July from the Central Pacific will be $57,904,177.36, as appears from the report of the Government actuary, which I hold in my hand. On the same date the actual amount due from the Union Pacific Railroad will be $53,289,593.45; that is the net balance.

that is the net balance.

Mr. SPALDING. That includes the accrued interest?
Mr. POWERS. It includes everything; it is the grand total of the whole debt. Mr. CORLISS. Mr. CORLISS. Neither the statement which the gentleman has made nor the report to which he has referred us gives distinctly the information for which I asked.

Mr. POWERS. Did the gentleman want the original amount of the indebtedness: Mr. CORLISS.

Yes, sir; the indebtedness when the roads were completed. Mr. POWERS. The gentleman will excuse me; I thought he wanted the present amount.

When the first subsidies were granted, the Union Pacific and the Kansas Pacific (that is this upper line displayed on the map and this lower line extending 394 miles, which is all one road received from the Government $33,539,512; and the Central Pacific Railroad of California and also the Western Pacific, which is now a part of the Central Pacific, received $27,855,680.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Is the difference between the amount of the original indebtedness and the figures at the present time made up solely by the interest that has not been paid?

Mr. POWERS. By that and by the application of the sinking fund. Now, then, this Congress is confronted with this condition: These subsidy bonds have some of them already matured, and the balance of them mature on the 1st day of January, 1898, and the 1st day of January, 1899. The time for action has come. The Government must do something to close out its relations with these roads. The President of the United States under the act of 1887 already has authority to foreclose the lien of the Government, and if necessary, pay off the underlying first mortgage. The first question, therefore, that presents itself to us is this: Is it wise business policy for the Government to foreclose its lien or to seize the property, as some gentlemen contend it may be seized under the act of 1862, and get out of it what it can by the foreclosure?

Supposing that these gentlemen are right—that the Government can seize this property; the act of 1862 provides that upon a default in the payment of this interest as it matures the Government shall be authorized to take possession of the property; but every lawyer knows that that does not mean at all that the Secretary of the Treasury can walk into the office of this company and demand possession of the road and its property, and by force of arms or otherwise actually take possession. It means that he can take possession only by judicial process. He must resort to some judicial process if his request is not granted peaceably. That implies litigation. That raises all the questions that the company might raise as to the right of the Government to do that. It does more: It would require that the Government pay off its underlying first mortgage in order to realize any benefit from the seizlying first mortgage in order to realize any benefit from the seizure. Suppose that the Government, instead of taking that course, should foreclose the mortgage by proceedings in the courts. Now, under the practice of the Federal courts where this case would go, the Government does not have what is known in New England as a strict foreclosure; that is, when the mortgage upon the fore-Closure takes the property itself.

Under the Federal Legislature the procedure must be to expose the property to public sale. The Government, therefore, if it forecloses the mortgage, must put the road and its property up at auction subject to the lien of the first mortgage, or it must pay off the lien and sell the fee of the property. Is that wise? Now, let us consider that matter for a moment. What would it amount to? It will cost the Government, to pay off the underlying mortgages upon the road, between sixty and seventy millions of dollars. the condition of the Treasury at this time, and the condition of the business of the country, warrant us in imposing on the Treas-ury a burden of sixty or seventy millions of dollars for the purpose of trying an experiment-for the purpose of trying the experiment of foreclosing the mortgage, and trying to get something for the property or the land that is left behind? Is it a wise proceed-ing? Would we do that in our dealings with individuals? Why, gentlemen, it seems to me that the absurdity of the proposition needs no illustration. Take a common case familiar in your own business experience and illustrated in everyday life. have a man who owes you a debt—and every man who hears me has undoubtedly some time in his business life had an insolvent debtor to deal with—if he had an insolvent debtor, and he held a second mortgage on the farm, a farm encumbered by an underlying mortgage big enough to sweep it all away, would he send for the debtor and say to him what you propose to say to these railroads? How would be conduct the business? Would be do it by pounding his debtor, swearing at him, calling him a thief, abusing him for the faults committed in the past; or would he deal with him on a business footing and proceed to get the very best settlement available? Would he say to him, "My dear sir, you are a gambler, or a thief; you are dabbling in politics, or worse, you have been dabbling with Polly, and to punish you for your sins I decline to deal with you on a sound business basis or on ordinary business principles. I will sacrifice your property as a punishment for your past sins, although probably by the same operation I lose the amount of my debt." Would any sensible man act in that way? That would be the act of a child. It would be simple.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Hull in the chair). The time of the gentleman from Vermont has expired.

Mr. POWERS. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that I have, by the consent of the House, entire control of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct; but under the rules of the House, even where unlimited time is within the control of a member, he is not allowed, except by unanimous consent, to occupy the floor for more than one hour.

Mr. POWERS. I ask unanimous consent to proceed. I shall not detain the committee very much longer.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I move that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from The CHAIRMAN. Vermont will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I would like to ask the gentleman from Vermont a question in connection with the matter he has just been discussing.
Mr. POWERS. Very well.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. If this property is now unable to pay the debt, why have you increased by your bill the first lien on the Union Pacific road for $21,000,000 and the first lien on the Central Pacific over $24,000,000?

Mr. POWERS. Because we get two dollars for one of additional security. But I will meet that point further on, if the gentleman will permit me to proceed.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I make the suggestion for this reason, that the Union Pacific, according to the appraised value of the increased securities, is only worth $36,000,000 to-day, and the land is put in at $16,000,000. No one acquainted with the facts will dispute the assertion that that land is not worth $16,000,000

Mr. POWERS. I will come to that later on.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as I was saying, as individuals dealing with an insolvent debtor we would be very likely to say "My dear sir, what I want to find out is your debt-paying capacity; the ability of your farm to meet the obligations. I want to know the average income of your farm under ordinary conditions?" When we have ascertained that fact we will adjust the burden to his shoulders in such way as he can bear it. Now, if by reducing our rate of interest and extending the debt for four or five years, it will enable him to work out from under the load and permit him to pay in full, why, manifestly every man here would adopt that plan. We have adopted the same plan in all of our dealings hereplan. We have adopted the same plan in all of our dealings here-tofore. We say that a foreclosure would be unavailing; that the receipts of the property would be unavailing from the fact that the thing you seize or foreclose is nothing in the world but an interior or underlying property.

But suppose, for instance, the Secretary of the Treasury should go to Denver and take possession of the Union Pacific line, under the act of 1862, and begin to operate it. What would be the effect? Why, he would start his trains from Denver and get within 3 miles of the bridge across the Missouri River, and be stopped there. There would be a fence built across his line and he could not get a mile farther without the consent of the parties who control the remainder of the line.

Mr. OGDEN. But could he not expropriate to get into the terminal point?

Mr. POWERS. You mean that it could be condemned under the right of eminent domain?

Mr. OGDEN. Yes.
Mr. POWERS. I should say, no. If one road has the property condemned under that right already, there is no authority, as far as I know, that would allow another road to come in and condemn again and take away the possession.

Mr. OGDEN. Not if they are not using it.

Mr. POWERS. But they can use it. The city of Omaha is a great city, and the roads from the East want to get in there.

There is not any trouble but what the bridge will be used, and these terminals down in Kansas City will be used. If he wanted to start out his train for Denver over that line he would have to jump over a half mile of track belonging to some one else before he could get onto his own road.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Is not Omaha as great a city from the

Mr. MAGUIRE. Is not Omaha as great a city from the West as an eastern terminal as it would be from the East for the other

Mr. POWERS. Well, I hope so. I do not know what the

Mr. MAGUIRE. Well, I should hope so.
Mr. POWERS. It is a pretty big city from the East.
Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question for information, because I could not find it in the report. I see you have, as the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Curtis] has said, an additional amount of $21,000,000-

Mr. POWERS. I will explain that. Mr. SWANSON. What I want to know is how that item is

Mr. POWERS. I should prefer not to be diverted from my line of thought, because I am coming right to that point.

Mr. BARHAM. Will it interrupt the gentleman—Mr. POWERS. I can not be interrupted by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARHAM]. He is going to talk, and he must talk in his own time.

Mr. BARHAM. I wanted to ask about the Omaha Bridge.

Mr. POWERS. I will give you all the information I have about it presently.

Now, as I have already said, if we are going to seize the property, or if we are going to foreclose the mortgages, it is important for us to consider what we are going to get under that proceeding. And, as you see, instead of getting a road with terminals, and with these branch lines, a network of which, as you will observe, runs all along in connection with these roads; instead of getting a system that can be worked as a railroad, we get an empty trunk, without terminals anywhere, and we have got to take our chances in dealing with somebody else.

Now, it may be said that these owners of these terminals, perhaps, and the owners of these branch lines are in just as bad a predicament as we are, that they want the trunk lines as much as we want their help. That is true, but how does that help the argument at all? It makes no difference what they want. The question is, What shall we have as a matter of legal right? And we have got to depend upon the graciousness of these parties or upon some inducement that we can hold out to them in order to have a completed railroad. That is what we are going to get.

have a completed railroad. That is what we are going to get.

Not only that. This road would have to be put up at public sale under foreclosure proceedings. Who on earth would be likely to bid it off? Would you or I or any outside party take the risk of stepping in and bidding on that property that was nothing but an interior property, without terminals or anything else? Certainly not. We should not dare to. The ownership of these branch lines, the very ownership of these terminals, the very ownership of everything essential to make that railroad worth a copper is in the hands of other parties and probably hostile parties. Now, where will you find the man with capital, the man who has millions of money to invest, who will step into a hornets' nest of that kind and make a bid? What is the practical result? These very men whom you are now scolding about, the very men who own the terminals and own these connecting lines are the only ones who can safely bid on the property, and probably they will be the only bidders. They would get the property at their own figures.

Every man can see what that would necessarily lead to. that the procedure of a foreclosure compels the Government to raise sixty or seventy millions more of money to put into this hop-per, and also leaves the Government with an insecure property after they have got their decree.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.
Mr. NORTHWAY. If we accept the bill of the committee, do we get security upon all of these terminals and branch lines clear

Mr. POWERS.

Mr. POWERS. We do. I am coming right to that.

Now, it struck the committee, and it has struck every committee that has ever considered this subject since the Pacific railroads have been built, it has struck all the railroad commissioners. everybody who has investigated the matter, and they have all reported with one voice, that the true way to solve this problem was to fund this debt by an extension at a lower rate of interest, get a security upon a line which, if we are obliged to take it, will be a railroad line and not a section of a railroad line.

This committee have therefore proposed this bill, the essential features of which are these: That the amount of the Government indebtedness shall be ascertained as of July 1 next. The present bill before you reads January 1; but, as I said before, this will have to be corrected, and I will ask for an amendment. On the 1st of July this indebtedness is to be ascertained by getting at the present worth of the subsidy bonds that have not yet matured, bringing them down to the 1st day of July, 1897, so that on that day we will know just exactly what is the debt from the railroad company to the Government; and that thereupon the companies themselves shall issue first-mortgage bonds, taking up the existing mortgage, not only on the aided portions of the lines, but on ing mortgage, not only on the aided portions of the lines, but on their entire system, issuing a first mortgage equal in amount to the principal of their existing first mortgage; and that the Government shall take a second mortgage, lapping over the same property, lapping over the terminals, the Omaha Bridge, worth $2,000.000, and lapping over the Denver and Pacific road that runs from Denver to Cheyenne, and lapping over the branches forming the Union Pacific. In other words, a blanket mortgage, resting upon all this property, from branch to branch, to the same extent as the first mortgage that we allow to be put on.

Now, will we gain anything by that? My friend from Kansas called my attention to this fact. I say we do. We get a mortgage on a system of roads. We get a mortgage on a railroad instead of a mortgage on a portion of a line. It covers the whole thing, the terminals at Council Bluffs, the Omaha Bridge, the Omaha terminals, and on the line clear through. Essentially it covers also this line from Kansas City out to the three hundred and ninety-fourth milepost, where it now ends, to Denver, together covers also this line from Kansas City out to the three hundred and ninety-fourth milepost, where it now ends, to Denver, together with all the branches and feeders that supply this line. So that if the worst comes to the worst in the end and the Government is obliged to foreclose its indebtedness, it can then take a property that can be operated as a railroad. There is one advantage.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. What would be the western terminus of that road that would be covered in the new mortgage to the Government?

ernment?

ernment?
Mr. POWERS. Ogden.
Mr. FAIRCHILD. How about the road still west of Ogden?
Mr. POWERS. That is the Central Pacific.
Mr. FAIRCHILD. That is operated by the Southern Pacific?
Mr. POWERS. That is now operated by the Southern Pacific.
Mr. FAIRCHILD. And this proposition would not include any of the property of the Southern Pacific?
Mr. POWERS. Certainly not. We can only deal with these two corporations as the Government has always dealt with them. The debt of the Government has not run against them jointly, but severally.

severally.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. One more question. Can the gentleman state how many alterations have been made as to the security given the original subsidy was granted to them?

by these roads since the original subsidy was granted to them?

Mr. POWERS. Three.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. What better position would we be in fifty years from now, in view of the fact that we have no road farther west than Ogden, if they again should come in and ask for a fifth alteration?

Mr. POWERS. The original act provides that these two lines shall be operated as one continuous line, and they always have

Mr. NORTHWAY. But not a continuous mortgage.
Mr. FAIRCHILD. But not a continuous mortgage.
Mr. POWERS. Congress could not make a continuous mortgage over the two corporations. The Union Pacific is our several debtor, and the Central Pacific is our several debtor, and the Central Pacific is our several debtor, and the Central Pacific is our several debtor. not our joint debtor; therefore we can not impose a joint mortgage upon the two.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Mr. FAIRCHILD. But they are operated by the same men? Mr. POWERS. Not at all; they are operated by distinct corporations. Mr. FAIRCHILD. By distinct railroad corporations, but by the same interest. Mr. POWERS. No, not in the same interest. The Union Pacific is separate in its interests from the Central Pacific, and the Central Pacific is separate in its interests from the Union Pacific.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Are not the men of the same interest making the same proposition as to both railroads?

Mr. POWERS. Both railroads will take this bill, but they do not have a joint interest in this property, and this bill is not framed

Mr. FAIRCHILD. My question is as to the individuals in interest in both companies, not as to the corporate identity. I understand that these companies are both here asking for this legislation and that the same people who are interested in them are also interested in the Southern Pacific.

Mr. POWERS. You say they are here asking for this legislation. I can not say that.

Mr. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman deny it?

Mr. POWERS. Yes; I will deny it.

Mr. HILBORN. Then who is asking for this bill?

Mr. POWERS. The Pacific Railroad Committee of the House of Representatives, representing the Government of the United States, are asking for it. This bill is objectionable to both companies

Mr. MAGUIRE. Then they can simply refuse to accept it.
Mr. POWERS. They can refuse, and it is not certain but that they will do so. This legislation is objectionable to them, and we have had to force upon them an unwilling dose.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Let me ask the gentleman—
Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I can not be interrupted by a gentleman who is doubtless going to talk upon this subject three times as much as I shall.

times as much as I shall.

Now, the bill proposes that this indebtedness shall be extended with interest at the rate of 2 per cent.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question for information, to see if I understand this matter. I understand that from the three hundred and ninety-fourth milepost on the Kansas Pacific up to Denver the Government has at present a first-mortgage lien?

Mr. POWERS. No, sir.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not mean the subsidized portion—

Mr. POWERS. No; the Government has no lien on that road from the three hundred and ninety-fourth milepost to Denver. The Denver and Pacific Railroad Company has an outstanding first mortgage, and we propose to allow the Union Pacific Company, under a reorganization, to place a first mortgage on its own propunder a reorganization, to place a first mortgage on its own property that shall be equal to the face value of the existing mortgages on the same property.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, from the three hundred and ninety-fourth milepost to Denver and to Cheyenne, Wyo., the first-mortgage bonds are included in the $21,000,000, are they not?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.
Mr. SWANSON. What is the earning capacity of that road to pay off the existing mortgage bonds?
Mr. POWERS. I will come to that in a moment, if the gentlepay off the existing mortgage bonds?

Mr. POWERS. I will come to that in a moment, if the gentleman will be a little patient. As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the provisions of this bill are simply these, that this debt shall be extended at 2 per cent interest. That looks like a small rate of interest, and the committee did their best to make it 3 per cent, but they studied and took into consideration the debt-paying capacity of the debtor, and they found that if they levied 3 per cent interest they would simply leave the debtor worse off than he was before. He would not be able to meet the obligations of the first year, and the whole arrangement would fall to the ground.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the gentleman upon what the committee's estimate was based?

Mr. POWERS. Upon the net earnings for a series of years.

what the committee's estimate was based?

Mr. POWERS. Upon the net earnings for a series of years, down to the present time.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Another question for information. You stated a while ago that the Government had diverted its traffic and had sent it over competing lines. I would like to know whether there has been any other diversion of traffic by the people whether there has been any other diversion of traine by the people owning the Union Pacific.

Mr. POWERS. Do you mean the Union or the Central Pacific?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Union and the Central both.

Has there been any other diversion of traffic to competing lines which are within the influence of the owners of the Central and which are within the influence of the owners of the Central and the Union Pacific?

Mr. POWERS. You will be told by my friends from California as this debate progresses that the Southern Pacific road has absorbed the earnings of the Central Pacific. That is not true. I shall not stop at this time to demonstrate that it is not true, but I can do it. I propose to wait, however, until they make the statement, and then I will undertake to show the House that there is not a particle of truth in it. As to the Union Pacific, I know of no diversion of its earnings to any other road whatever. I never heard any intimation made that it had diverted its earnings.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the gentleman from Vermont prepared to say that the Union Pacific has had its proportion of the business; that there has been no diversion of traffic from it? I understand that there are competing lines, and it has been stated that the traffic her hear diverted to these lines.

that the traffic has been diverted to those lines.

Mr. POWERS. It is quite true that there are competing lines running from Chicago to Denver. I think there are three of them; running from Chicago to Denver. Tenna eact and certainly two.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Are they not controlled by the same people who control the Pacific roads?

Mr. POWERS. No, sir; they are not controlled by the same people, and one of those roads, as we are informed, is here now, trying, in its own interest, to defeat this bill. There are competing roads, but no man has asserted, and I do not think any man will assert that either the Burlington or the Missouri Pacific or will assert, that either the Burlington or the Missouri Pacific or the Rock Island is part and parcel of the Union Pacific.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am not hostile to the gentleman's plan. I am asking for information.

Mr. POWERS. Well, these other roads are hostile to the Union

That is the fact

Now, then, as to the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific, it may be generally said that, in order to get at what the companies have paid on this indebtedness, the committee made a careful study of their net earnings in the situation in which they are placed and with the circumstances surrounding them, for several years back, including not only years of prosperity, but years of adversity. All railroads, like all other business enterprises, are the beneficiaries of good times and the victims of bad times. In order, therefore, to get at a fair average we have studied that question very deeply; and we have come to the conclusion that $4,000,000 in each case will cover the last dollar that can be safely counted upon as certain net earnings of this company. We have placed and with the circumstances surrounding them, for several counted upon as certain net earnings of this company. We have started on that basis; and starting upon that basis we have prepared this bill, which figures out like this—

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in connection with the dividends. Why does the bill provide for connection with the dividends. Why does the bill provide for dividends at 4 per cent on the stock, when the Government can get only 2 per cent on the bonds that are held for the stock?

Mr. POWERS. Well, my dear sir, if you expect a railroad company to undertake to pay a debt, do you imagine you can ignore the stockholders? Can you say to the stockholders of a railroad corporation under these circumstances, "Gentlemen, you never these circumstances," shall hope to get a dollar out of this property; but we are going to compel you to pay this debt?"

Mr. LACEY. The point of my question was why the dividends should be larger than the interest on the bonds?

Mr. POWERS. We propose to allow a 4 per cent dividend in order to bring the stockholders into this arrangement. We want them to undertake this burden, and we can not get them to do so unless they can see a chance some time of getting something out of the property for themselves; and 4 per cent is a small dividend with which to tempt them into this arrangement.

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman tell us what is the present

Mr. MOODY. Will the gentleman tell us what is the present market value of the stock upon which it is now proposed to pay a 4 per cent dividend?

Mr. POWERS. The market value of the Central Pacific stock, so far as I have known anything about it during the last six months, is about 17. The market value of the Union Pacific is nil. You will see the Union Pacific stock quoted in the papers as selling at $9 and $10; but the explanation of that is this: The Union Pacific stock quoted in the papers as selling at $9 and $10; but the explanation of that is this: Pacific reorganization committee has corralled 95 per cent of this stock—has gathered in the certificates under an agreement with the holders that they will stand an assessment of $15 a share, and has issued to each stockholder a certificate that the stock is so held. Those certificates, coupled with that obligation, are put on the market and sold to-day for nine or ten dollars. The last market quotation which I saw was about $10; and those same certificates obliged the holder to stand an assessment of $15 a share.

Mr. HILBORN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask what dividend the Central Pacific is now paying on its stock?

Mr. POWERS. My friend from California [Mr. HILBORN] is going to make a very eloquent and plausible speech before this debate closes, and I suggest that he ask that question of himself and answer it

I should go back, perhaps, a step in this debate and say that in addition to this mortgage which it is proposed to place upon the whole property of the system, it is provided in the bill that the companies shall secure the payment of the annual requirements made of them by giving the Government the right to withhold the money that will be due from the Government to the company addition to this mortgage which it is proposed to place upon the whole property of the system, it is provided in the bill that the companies shall secure the payment of the annual requirements made of them by giving the Government the right to withhold the money that will be due from the Government to the company for transportation services until these current annual requirements are met.

As I have already said, the Government is a patron of these ments are met.

As I have already said, the Government is a patron of these freighting that it has occasion to do in that part of the country. Their patronage has amounted in the past to a large sum of money. In the case of the Central Pacific, a much larger sum, I think about double that amount—about $1,200,000 a year. So that by giving the Government the right to retain their money in its Treasury until the companies have met and discharged their annual obligations, the entire interest charge, at least, due from the companies will be met by that money alone, leaving nothing to be provided for on the part of the companies except the annual cash payment, which, as I shall presently show, is a requirement that both of the companies must come under. We provide that they shall pay this rate of interest semiannually; we secure the payment of it and the payment of all the obligations we assume by this first mortgage, plus the right on the part of the companies to retain in its own hands money enough to meet the sannual ment to retain in its own hands money enough to meet the annual ment to retain in its own hands money enough to meet the annual interest charge.

Now, in addition to that interest we require them to pay an annual installment upon the principal of the debt, amounting in the case of each road to $365,000, so that each road, as will be seen, will pay into the Treasury, if it complies with these requirements, $1,000 a day, or, for the two roads, $2,000 a day, for the first ten years that this contract will be in force. For the second decade they are to pay the sum of $550,000 each, plus the interest as it matures, or a little over $1,500 each per day. And thereafter, until the whole debt is paid, they are to pay annually the sum of $750,000.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I wish to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, who is now on the floor, the Committee on Pacific Railroads, who is now on the floor, whether he believes that these companies can comply with these obligations if the relief contemplated in this bill be granted them? Mr. POWERS. I am very glad the gentleman has put that question. It is a pertinent one. My friend from Kentucky has struck the very kernel of this whole question. That is the question—Can the companies comply? There is no use in harassing your debtor so that he can not comply. The question is a very pertinent one, and coming from the source it does, I am very grateful to my friend for asking it.

Now, we think the companies can comply with these require-

Now, we think the companies can comply with these requirements. As I have already said, their net earnings per year are safely enough counted at $4,000,000, and that under the most adverse conditions that we can reasonably expect the companies to rest under in the future

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think I may say, without undertaking to prophesy, that the times could clearly be worse in the future than they have been in the past three years, and yet during that time these roads certainly had earnings enough to comply with the requirements of the Government.

In the case of the Central Pacific Railroad we require, inasmuch as they are leased to the Southern Pacific, that the Southern Pacific Company shall be required to enter into an obligation and guarantee to the Government, or rather to assume the payment of this annual requirement of the Government: The Southern Pacific Railway Company is a large corporation. It was chartered in the gentleman's own State. It has a vast amount of property. Some of our friends will no doubt tell you in the course of this discussion that it is not good for anything. But it is one of the heaviest corporations in the country. Certainly it does not hurt your security to have a second indorser, even though he may not be regarded as strictly good. We say in this case that the indorser be regarded as strictly good. We say in this case that the indorser is good.

Not only that, but there is a sum of money, amounting to $2.414,000, or thereabouts, now in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Southern Pacific Company—not the Central Pacific, but belonging to the indorser, the guarantor, of the Central Pacific—which we demand shall be presently applied in reduction of the Central Pacific debts of the Government. We have no right to it as a matter of law. It is a question that has been in contention as to whether it belonged to the Central or the Southern Pacific road for a long time. The courts have decided that it belonged to the Southern Pacific, and we can not legally demand payment of the same; but the committee exacts, as a requirement for this bill and to bring this company to a strict compliance with for this bill and to bring this company to a strict compliance with the terms of the bill, that this payment shall be made, and they have filed an assurance that it may be done.

Now, to answer the question of my friend from Kentucky.

The payment of both the Central Pacific Company and the other roads will be about as follows: The payments on behalf of the $1,153,630.58; and installment of principal, $365,000; making a total of $3,825,890.85. You will see that this is some $100,000 less less than the $4,000,000 limit.

The question may be asked, Why do we leave it at that? The answer is, We can not make it 3 per cent interest, because that would add some $550,000 to the burden of the Union Pacific road and carry it beyond the limit. In the case of the Central Pacific it would carry it above the average by some $570,000 beyond the four-million limit. And so you see we are necessarily tied down

Besides that, Mr. Chairman, these companies should have a little margin in their treasury. Who does not know that every railroad is compelled to meet unexpected demands, such as a valuable bridge burning down, a valuable depot property being destroyed by fire; accidents by which personal injuries are received and compensation necessarily demanded therefor. In other words, the compensation necessarily demanded therefor. In other words, the debtor must have a little pocket money to meet the contingencies. Is that not the case in all business matters? What business man does not conduct his business on something of that same principle? Would he say to the debtor, "Give me the last cent you have left in your pocket; I will not leave you anything; your family may be sick, your house may burn up, a thousand and one things may happen to you; but I don't care, I will leave you nothing?" What sensible man would not leave him something to cover contingencies gencies.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. If the gentleman will allow me, in that connection, I wish to call his attention to a statement in the reconnection, I wish to call his attention to a statement in the report. On page 10 of the report you say that the Government would receive from both roads annually, for the first decade, for principal and interest, some $3,000,000. Is that not a mistake? Should it not be $5,000,000 as the receipts from both?

Mr. POWERS. Possibly there may be an error there. I will be glad if the gentleman will make the computation.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I think it is a mistake in the print, It ought to be something over $5,000,000.

Mr. POWERS. Now, the Union Pacific will make the following payments:

ing payments:

Interest at 4 per cent on first mortgage	$2,189,240.00 1,074,308.17
Installment of principal	365,000.00

Now, if I have not answered the question of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. McCreary], I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. McCreary], I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. McCreary of Kentucky. I am very much obliged to the gentleman. I think he has answered the question very fully. I desire to ask another question in that connection. I think the gentleman touched upon it before. In your bill you provide for the extension of the Government lien on certain property.

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If you have stated it, I did not hear it, and I ask you to state it again. What do you value the property at which is covered by this extended lien?

Mr. POWERS. In reference to the valuation of this additional property that the Government will have a mortgage upon, of course it is a question that every gentleman must judge of for himself.

Now, take the case of the terminals at Denver. I have a statement which shows the amount of property. This railroad owns 2,000 acres of land there. I am speaking now of what appeared in 1890, six years ago. They owned 2,000 acres of land and 60 miles of side tracks, together with their warehouses, their depots, and everything of that sort. At Kansas City they owned 233 acres of land and 30 miles of siding. At Omaha they owned 319 acres in the very heart of the city, and 45 miles of side track. At Council Bluffs they owned 1,000 acres of land, together with all their warehouses and everything of that sort.

Well, now, to say how much that property is worth in dollars and cents is a very difficult question to answer. Connected with this railroad and as a part of this railroad, it is invaluable. If you want to get at it by asking me how much it will take to duplicate it, I answer that Mr. Choate, the division superintendent of the Union Pacific, says you can not duplicate the terminals in Denver for less than $10,000,000. Not only that, they say that the coal lands that are owned by the Union Pacific Railroad are themselves worth the entire Government debt. Now, take the case of the terminals at Denver.

selves worth the entire Government debt. Why, the Union Pacific Company has coal beds along its line, so that it is supplied with coal at a nominal price per ton. It costs them hardly anything. These coal lands of the railroad are invaluable adjuncts.

And of course if they are so valuable to the railroad, they must

and of course if they are so valuable to the railroad, they must necessarily be so to the Government, if the Government is compelled in the end to take the railroad.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Just one more question. Your report shows that the Government lien is extended over very valuable properties indeed, including about 20 per cent of the mainline mileage of the Union Pacific Railroad. The point I desire to get at is this: The prior lien, which is now about $61,000,000, will be increased, as I understand it, by your bill, $21,000,000 on the Union Pacific and about $24.000,000 on the Central Pacific. I want to see if the property that the lien would be extended to, want to see if the property that the lien would be extended to, not now embraced, would cover about that?

Mr. POWERS. I will say in answer to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. McCreary] that in 1890 the Senate appointed a committee, of which Mr. Frye was chairman. They went out over this property and made an extended examination of it. They had experts with them. They looked into the question of the value of this property, and they reported unanimously that in their judgment these railroads were worth $47,000 per mile of main line, and that the terminals were worth the figures which I have been quoting the terminals were worth the figures which I have been quoting from their report.

They reported a bill which was very similar to the one now under consideration. It provided for an extension of time, at 2 per cent interest. It provided for an annual payment, not so much as we provide, but they estimated at that time the value of that property, and made out that the excess of security over and above what we now have was not less than $92,000,000.

Now, that was six years ago. Whether the property is worth more in dollars and cents to-day I leave to every man here to consider. Of course, these railroad terminals have been expanded; new sidings have been put in; new buildings have been completed; so that I think it is fair to reason, although we have no expert testimony on the subject, that the terminals at all these places are worth more to-day than they were worth six years ago.

Now, then, I have taken more time than I intended to in the discussion of this measure.

Mr. PERKINS. Before the gentleman concludes: I have listened with much interest to the debate. I have heard nothing in regard to the Sioux City and Pacific road. The gentleman is aware that the people of the Northwest are somewhat interested with reference to connection along the line originally proposed by with reference to connection along the line originally proposed by the Sioux City and Pacific. Now, I would like to inquire of the gentleman if there is any consideration involved for the Sioux City and Pacific road?

Mr. POWERS. I am very sorry to say, in reply to my friend from Iowa, that this committee has not felt itself permitted or justified in according any aid to the Sioux City enterprise. I suppose, and I have no doubt my friend knows that fact, that some amendment will be proposed covering that ground, and when it is it will be time enough to discuss that. I prefer not to exhaust my time and be diverted in that way. This bill does not do any good to the Sioux City road.

Mr. PERKINS. The Sioux City and Pacific road is a branch of the Union Pacific?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS (continuing). And that property is not considered in this bill?

sidered in this bill?

Mr. POWERS. Nor is the property of the Central Branch considered another one of the parts of the Union Pacific Railroad Company. They have nothing to do with it.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not understand at this time anything in the way of aid is asked for the Sioux City and Pacific Branch, but it is proposed to ask for recognition in the way of connection, etc., if that line is built. An amendment to accomplish that purpose will be offered if an opportunity is afforded.

Mr. POWERS. Very good. I will assure my friend that no objection will be made to any proper amendment that he or any other gentleman may offer.

I have already taken more time than I intended in the discussion of this measure, my purpose mainly being to bring to your sion of this measure, my purpose mainly being to bring to your mind a little résumé of the history of this transaction, so that, mind a little resume of the history of this transaction, so that, knowing what the past of these roads has been, you would be betber able to know what their future ought to be and what you should do in disposing of this question. This committee are in accord with every committee in either House that has considered this subject. They present a plan here similar to that which has received the sanction of other committees, and one that has has received the sanction of other committees, and one that has received the sanction of every person that has ever investigated the matter. It may be imperfect. I wish it were better. I wish we could get a mortgage with ample security paying 6 per cent interest. But we have taken the best we could, and we have squeezed them, to use a homely expression, to the last cent. We have approached the very verge of their possible pecuniary ability in the requirements we have imposed upon them.

Now, the practical question remaining is, Will this Congress undertake to collect this debt from these companies, or will it ruthlessly throw it away? You will doubtless be regaled by some of the bitterest denunciations against the managers of these com-of the bitterest denunciations against the managers of these comof the bitterest denunciations against the managers of these companies. I have tried to forefend against that by saying they have not taken a dollar from the Government. If they have taken it from somebody else, let somebody else do the fighting. We can not go into the fight between Mr. Huntington and Mayor Sutro, of San Francisco. We are engaged in making an effort to collect a debt from an insolvent debtor, and the question, gentlemen, with all its momentous issues, is submitted to your sound judgment in the hope that you will find, after you have investigated it, that this is the best possible way to get along with this uncomfortable

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the gentleman takes his seat, perhaps my attention was diverted, but the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Curris] asked a question about the increased stock, and the increased amount in bonds and mortgage bonds upon the lines. Did the gentleman touch upon that?

Mr. POWERS. I intended to. The gentleman did not com-

Mr. HENDERSON. I knew the gentleman asked the question.
Do I understand that it is a doubling up of its indebtedness?
Mr. POWERS. We take the exact first mortgages on every foot of this system and put them in a hotchpot at their face value and say that the company may issue a new first mortgage of the same amount as the first mortgages now existing on the property, and that we then put our debt on the top of that.

that we then put our debt on the top of that.

Mr. PATTERSON. I apprehend that the gentleman's inquiry goes to this point, whether the contemplated mortgage increases the first-mortgage lien on the subsidized line.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is exactly the point I wished to get at.

Mr. POWERS. It increases it in one sense, and in another it does not. Take this line [indicating]; in ascertaining the amount of the new mortgage we count the existing first mortgage on this line, plus the existing first mortgage on that line [indicating], and add them together, which gives the amount of the general first mortgage, and the debt to the Government goes on top of that.

Mr. SWANSON. I see in the report that you make this amount $21,999,000, but the report does not state the names of the securities of which that sum is made up. Now, I would like to know the names of the securities that make it up, so that we may ascertain their value in the market.

Mr. POWERS. I have stated once or twice that they are the

Mr. FOW EAS. I have stated once of the control of t think they ought to be stated, so that we might be enabled to see what is their value to-day.

Mr. POWERS. I can not give the names of the securities without consulting the reports, because they are quite numerous.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. The gentleman will find that information in Mr. Bell's report.

Mr. SWANSON. I have Mr. Bell's report. He simply gives the estimated value. What I want to know is what the securities are. As I understand, this estimate puts them at par. Now, if the securities are not worth that amount, it might perhaps be better for us to pay $10,000,000 for them rather than extend them over the entire line.

Mr. POWERS. There is no question, Mr. Chairman, as to the value of the property, and before the discussion ends I will submit a table which will satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. PARKER. Did I understand the gentleman correctly when I understood him to state that the new first mortgage would cover all of the system?

Mr. POWERS. The entire system of the Union Pacific Com-

Mr. PARKER. And all of the first-mortgage debt?
Mr. POWERS. The first mortgage on the entire system will be made up of existing first mortgages on the different parts of it. There are several corporations, each of which has a first mortgage.

Mr. PARKER. In the receiver's report I find: First-mortgage bonds, $40,000,000, with $2,500,000 interest also, other bonded debt, $40,000,000, and $2,500,000 interest; making $45,000,000 on that system. Now—

Mr. POWERS. If the gentleman will pardon me, I have not seen that report, and I do not like to talk about it without having examined it, but I will try to answer the gentleman's inquiry before the debate ends.

before the debate ends.

Mr. PARKER. Another question. Why is the description of the property of the Union Pacific Railroad so different from the description of the Central Pacific Railroad's property? I notice that the description of the Central Pacific property includes every property of that railroad company, all bonds, stocks, etc., owned by it, and that those words are left out of the description of the property of the Union Pacific.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman, I think, is laboring under a mistake. The description covers the same thing in both cases. A more careful examination will show the gentleman that the descriptions are alike and we require an inventory of the property.

descriptions are alike and we require an inventory of the property to be filed in the Treasury.

Mr. PARKER. I think the gentleman himself is mistaken on that point.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to be discourteous, but I have taken so much time that I must decline to answer further questions at this time, and now I leave the matter in other hands, reserving the balance of my time.

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Chairman, that the House may be a lit-Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Charman, that the House may be a little further informed as to the history of this property, more particularly in its financial aspects, that it may act more intelligently, I wish to state that, in pursuance of the laws of 1862 and 1864, while there were privileges granted these railroads, there were also some restrictions, to one of which only I wish to call attention at this time. A portion of the second section of the act of 1864 provides:

That the said company shall make assessments upon its stockholders of not less than $5 per share, and at intervals of not exceeding six months from and after the passage of this act, until the par value of all shares subscribed shall be fully paid, and money only shall be received for such assessments, or as an equivalent for any portion of the capital stock hereinafter authorized.

The Union Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated with a capital stock of $60,800,000, of which there was paid in, under capital stock of $60,800,000,000, of which there was paid in, under assessments, 16 per cent, instead of 100 per cent as required by this law. The Central Pacific was incorporated for $68,000,000 capital, upon which but a little over 10 per cent was paid in accordance with the provisions of the act. The Western Pacific organized with a capital stock of $7,900,000, upon which 2½ per cent was paid. The Kansas Pacific was organized with a capital stock of $9,000,000, and not one dellar was even paid for any of that stock $9,000,000, and not one dollar was ever paid for any of that stock. It would be interesting to go over the history of the construction of these roads—the manner in which they were built; but I do not propose to do so. Suffice it to say that in the construction of the Central Pacific Railroad there accrued to those who built it a profit of $62,000,000.

In the construction of the Union Pacific there was a profit to those who built it of $44,000,000. That was prior, of course, to the time when the roads were completed and when they were earning money on the other lines. Upon this profit of $62,000,000 on the Central Pacific (which is now joined for all practical purposes with the Western Pacific) there was paid $43,000,000 in dividends. Upon the Union and the Kansas Pacific, which have been consolidated and now constitute one road, there has been paid in dividends $28,000,000 dividends $28,000,000.

Now, understand, Mr. Chairman, I do not speak in any hostile Now, understand, Mr. Chairman, I do not speak in any hostile spirit of the gentlemen who have made this money. If they have violated any law, the proper executive officers of this Government are the ones to attend to that matter; if they have not violated any law in the accumulation of this money, neither myself nor anyone else has any right to complain. My object in stating these profits, first upon the construction of the roads and second upon the dividends that have been earned and paid upon the properties, is to show that the railroads themselves are strong financially, while the corporations that have control of them are bankrupt and unable to discharge to-day, as they claim, a single dollar of their indebtedness to the Government.

I agree with the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers] that this is a business proposition. I am glad that he wishes to have the matter submitted to the House on that theory. Now, the first principle for us to investigate is as to the earning powers of these roads. Surely the net earnings of these properties ought to be our guide in ascertaining what the companies could pay. The only statement that we had in regard to the earnings of the Central Pacific was given by Mr. Tweed, who appeared as attorney for the Central Pacific Railroad. Here is his statement:

In 1890 the earnings were $898,000; in 1891, $2,144,000; in 1892 (the year after the abnormal year), $861,000; in 1893, $784,000; in 1894, $144,000; in 1895, estimated at $42,000.

I say that such a decline as this requires some explanation. Mr. Tweed went on to show that upon the company's net earnings that Tweed went on to show that upon the company's net earnings that company could stand practically the requirements of this bill—that is, about $1,200,000 a year. The money would be secured by refunding its debt at 4 or 5 per cent interest, and also by the company being permitted to withhold from the sinking fund of the United States the payment of about $530,000 a year.

Now, in opposition to the statement of Mr. Tweed, I wish to call attention to Poor's Manual, page $15. The net earnings of that road for 1890, as given in Poor's Manual, were (I am giving merely round figures) $6,000,000. Mr. Tweed gives the amount as $898,000. In 1891, according to Poor's Manual, the earnings were $7,000,000; according to Mr. Tweed, $2,000,000. In 1892, according to Poor, the earnings of the road were $5,707,000; according to Mr. Tweed, $831,000. In 1893 the earnings, as given by Mr. Poor, were $5,739,000; by Mr. Tweed, $784,000. In 1894, according to Poor's Manual, the earnings were $4,854,000; according to Mr. Tweed, $144,000.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman permit a single suggestion?

Mr. HUBBARD. Yes, sir.
Mr. MAGUIRE. I think it is fair to state, in justice to Mr. Tweed and other gentlemen who appeared before the committee, that none of them were put under oath.

Mr. HUBBARD. Well, I assume that all men are honest; they ought to be, if they are not.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. Does Poor's Manual give the

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. Does Poor's Manual give the gross earnings or the net earnings?

Mr. HUBBARD. It gives the net earnings. Very likely it will be said in answer to this that if we deduct the interest on other bonded indebtedness of this road, the net earnings would be reduced to the amounts stated by Mr. Tweed. Prima facie, this can not be pertinently done to any great extent. The indebtedness underlying the lien of the Government, and which is the first mortgage, with the application of the sinking fund already accumulated and which is applicable to the discharge of that first mortgage, need not be over $19,000,000, which at 5 per cent would make less than $1,000,000 to be taken from the figures given in Poor's Manual. If we refer to the report of the Railroad Commissioner for 1895, page 29, we will find this view sustained. It gives the total net earnings at $13,622,000. That is the revenue received from all departments of the railroad, operating departments and all. The expenses are as follows: ments and all. The expenses are as follows:

 Operating expenses
 $8,624,534.99

 Interest on first-mortgage bonds
 1,671,180.00

 Interest on other funded debt—
 1,671,200.00

Now, I wish gentlemen to bear this item in mind, because I am going to call attention to it again in a very few minutes—

	$1,678,772.50
Interest on other debt, credit	86, 024. 41
New construction and equipment	111, 288, 60
Rintals, nonaided road	8, 100, 42
Expenses of land department, including taxes	162, 525. 55
Sinkinz-fund requirements, company	647, 451, 67
Losses on stocks of other companies	695, 466, 41
United States sinking-fund requirement	599, 700, 90
Land receipts paid to trustees of land mortgage	161, 262, 43
Miscellaneous	323, 616. 33

It will thus be seen that the miscellaneous expenses amount to almost $1,000 a day. I submit that this matter of miscellaneous expenses ought to be very carefully dissected in order to ascertain waere so much money has gone. The amount, I repeat, is almost where so much money has gone. The amount, I repeat, is almost $1,000 a day—the sum which it appears under the pending bill this company proposes to pay every day in liquidation of its debt to this Government, amounting now to practically $57,000,000, and which will require eighty-three years to extinguish.

This statement, as I have given it, shows a deficit of $975,871.

The question we have to consider, therefore, is the amount of the interest of the statement of the statement.

The question we have to consider, therefore, is the amount of the income above operating expenses and taxes to carry fixed charges. Before going into that, however, let me premise:

On page 28 of the same report of the Commissioner of Railroads we are given a table showing the bonded debt of the Central Pacific Railroad Company as $37,879,000 in round numbers, made up roughly of four classes—about $28,000,000 of the first-mortgage bonds, about $28,000,000 of the subsidy bonds, about $15,000,000 of bonds on the land—land-mortgage bonds, they call them—and about $17,000,000 on the California and Oregon and the San Joaquin Valley Railroad. The interest on these bonds is 5 per cent, save the interest on the San Joaquin Valley Railroad, being $6,080,000, which is 6 per cent.

$6,080,000, which is 6 per cent.

From these facts it will be seen that the item of interest, to which I called attention a moment ago and which I asked you to bear in mind—that that interest, while not being exactly right for the interest on the subsidy bonds of the Government or the combined interest on the land-mortgage bonds and the California and Oregon and San Joaquin Valley bonds, may mean either for the purpose of showing a deficit. The Railroad Commissioner could not tell me to what bonds that interest was to discharge.

But, Mr. Chairman, it does not make any difference whether it means the Government subsidy bonds, or the interest on the land means the Government subsidy bonds, or the interest on the land mortgages, or the California and Oregon, or the San Joaquin Valley Railroad. If it meant interest on the subsidy bonds, since it was never paid there is no deficit, but a surplus of $702,901.41. The item of losses on the stock, amounting to $695,466, is not an ordinary railroad expense, and has no business there. Here is a company's sinking-fund requirement of $647,000; the United States requirement of $599,000, making a total available to show the net earning capacity of the road to sustain new bonds of $2,648,000. There are also other items of expense not necessarily or usually included in this connection. For instance, the interest on other debts, credits, $$0,000; new construction and equipment, $111,000, making about $200,000 more. This brings up the ment, $111,000, making about $200,000 more. This brings up the surplus to almost $3,000,000. Then if you apply the sinking fund that is in the California sinking fund to the reduction of the first mortgage, it leaves that debt at about $19,000,000, which, refunded mortgage, it leaves that debt at about $19,000,000, which, refunded at 5 per cent, would be a further saving of some $700,000 a year to go into the fund available to carry new bonds. Then the Government's own mortgage of about $27,500,000, reduced by the sinking fund of about $3,000,000, will make a further increase in the earnings sufficient to run that fund above operating expenses and taxes to about $4,000,000.

If the hypothesis in respect to the third item of the expenditures be wrong, and that item refers to interest paid on the California and Oregon and San Joaquin Valley Railroad Company's bonds, the result is quite as inconsistent with the proposition in the bill reported, for if the company must assume those bonds to realize the above income, then the company is entitled to the security of the bonds, and in that event equal benefit would be derived from the application of the company's sinking fund to any of the bonds; but the Railroad Commissioner's report shows that the consolidated companies received Government land grants of 12,500,000 acres, enough of which have been sold at $3.50 per acre to realize over $9,000,000, and that the balance—something short of 10,000,000 acres—are held by the company at an average price of $3 per acre, which amounts to nearly enough to pay off both the $15,000,000 land mortgages and the San Joaquin Valley and California and Oregon Ballered Company's bonds to fornia and Oregon Railroad Company's bonds, too.

The material inference as to earning capacity to be drawn from these figures is, of course, entirely inconsistent with the impres-sion made by Tweed's statement. Very likely the inference is erroneous somewhere, but we have no information to correct it. Others who are accustomed to speak intelligently upon such matters seem to be as little advised. Thus the Railroad Commissioner has deemed it important to insert in his report a statement from Poor's last manual, as follows:

It is reported that an arrangement has recently been made whereby the Southern Pacific guarantees a minimum of 1 per cent yearly on the stock of this company until satisfactory legislation has been obtained for the adjustment of the debt to the Government, when the dividend will be increased to 2 per cent for a guaranteed period of two years. Payments will be made half-yearly the 1st of July, 1895.

The par of the outstanding stock is $67,275,500, and the Manual shows a 2 per cent dividend paid upon it in 1893, amounting to $1,345,510.

For these reasons we do not know what Mr. Tweed was taking For these reasons we do not know what Mr. I weed was taking into account or to what purpose he was speaking when he said that the net earnings of the road last year—the same year of the Commissioner's report which we have quoted and analyzed—were $42,000, and the earnings in 1893, $784,000; that the average earnings were $812,000 per year for five years, and yet his statements and that of Mr. Huntington—that the company could not carry out Mr. Hubbard's plan, hereinafter mentioned, and that this bill is the best he could do—are all the foundation we know of for the terms fixed in the bill terms fixed in the bill.

Recommendation of this bill by the committee, as qualified to advise, as a bill adapted to the assets or resources of either com-advise, as a bill adapted to the assets of resources of either company, would therefore seem to be founded on mere assumption.

The only knowledge we have peculiar to this bill is that it is satisfactory to the companies. That does not mean that it would be carried out, for they are both insolvent, and their undertakings are, of course, idle. The bill, so far as the Union Pacific is concerned, is an option to its successors—it is substantially so stated—unlimited in time and hindier on the Government while the class. unlimited in time, and binding on the Government, while the Government's own lien may be extinguished by the foreclosure of the first mortgage.

In 1893, when Mr. Tweed says that the net earnings on that property were but $784,000, Poor's Railroad Manual says that there was a dividend paid on the stock of the Central Pacific Railroad of $1,345,510. Of course, if you can deduct dividends paid on the capital stock, you can cut the net earnings of any road down very seriously. You can make a deficit easily if that is to be the kind seriously. You can make a deficit easily if that is to be the kind of calculating and the method of mathematics employed in demonstrating the net earning capacity of the road.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow a question?

tion?

Mr. HUBBARD. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is it not a fact that in 1893 there was $600,000 more paid by the Central Pacific Company in dividends—that is to say, $1,345,510 in all—than Mr. Tweed, their attorney, said to the committee was the amount of the net earnings of the road in 1893? He said the net earnings were $700,000.

Mr. HUBBARD. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yet that same year that road paid over thirteen hundred thousand dollars in dividends?

Mr. HUBBARD. That is what I tried to say. There came before that committee representatives of the various companies, and they submitted plans. Those plans at first were not alike. They were very different indeed. I will give you first the plan submitted by the reorganization committee of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, represented by their attorney, Mr. Pierce, and Railroad Company, represented by their attorney, Mr. Pierce, and their secretary, Mr. Krech. They came before the committee and offered in settlement for the debt due the Government $35,000,000 of 4 per cent first-mortgage bonds, out of a total authorized issue of one hundred millions, limited to an actual issue of eighty-seven millions, and that for the unreimbursed interest, amounting in millions, and that for the unreimbursed interest, amounting in round numbers to $20,000,000, they would give the Government a 4 per cent preferred stock in the discharge of the debt of practically fifty-five millions. They showed that the company was sufficiently strong to carry this obligation of $100,000,000 4 per cent bonds, and also the authorized issue of $75,000,000 preferred stock limited to an actual issue of $68,000,000.

Those bonds were to be fifty-year bonds, but in order to compare with the bill that has been adopted by the committee and which is sought to be passed, I have proposed to carry the figures out to the full term that the bonds will run under the present bill, as for comparison this is fair.

In the case of the Union Pacific Railroad it will require eightythree years to discharge their debt. Now, 4 per cent on $35,000,000 first-mortgage bonds for eighty-three years amounts to $111,000,000. Your principal will still be unimpaired. Adding that to the interest that you receive, you will have collected and due $146,000,000 in the eighty-three years.

This plan was not looked upon favorably by the committee, was not accepted, and they offered then, instead of giving the twenty millions of preferred stock, to issue a second mortgage for the twenty millions at 2 per cent, to go annually to the reduction of the principal, and the bond itself to bear no interest. That is, they would virtually pay the bond in fifty years; but in case they did that they wanted the interest reduced from 4 per cent to 3 per cent on the first-mortgage bonds. Now that is just about $5,000,000 better proposition for the company than the first proposition. Neither one found favor with the committee

Neither one found favor with the committee.

Then appeared the present bill, the Smith-Frye-Huntington bill—I scarcely know what to call it, but it is the bill introduced by Mr. Smith of Illinois, and is practically the bill that the company say they can comply with. They seek to pass through this House this bill, giving an eighty-three-year bond, with 2 per cent interest on the decreasing capital, with a small payment every year to go to the reduction of the principal.

Now the Hubbard plan was made first by the Central Pacific.

Now, the Hubbard plan was made first by the Central Pacific Railroad Company. General Hubbard, of New York, as attorney for the former Hopkins estate, thinking that the bill we have now could not pass, came before the committee and said that that company would undertake to do something which has never yet been pany would undertake to do something which has never yet been ingrafted in a bill, and which has introduced a new element in the discharge of these debts. He said that the Central Pacific Company, after the application of the sinking fund that now is in the Treasury, and which can be applied to the reduction of the subsidy bonds—that if the Government will apply that to the extinguishment of the subsidy mortgage as far as it will go, the Central Pacific Company would raise money enough to discharge the balance of the subsidy bonds, and thereby stop the interest the Government has to pay in carrying these mortgages interest the Government has to pay in carrying these mortgages

The Government would stop by that plan the carrying of any Pacific railroad mortgages. For the unreimbursed interest he proposed to give what he called an income bond, which should bear interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum with no sinking fund. The Government was to retain in the Treasury of the United States the earnings which those roads make every year by carrying the mails, munitions of war, and similar transportation as a further guaranty of the payment of this annual interest on the income bonds. That income bond would have amounted to about $38,000,000. The interest on that $38,000,000 at 2 per cent is $760,000 a year.

Now, it will be observed that that is an entirely new feature in this transaction. By the company coming forward and relieving the Government from paying a dollar on these subsidy bonds that the Government from paying a dollar on these subsidy bonds that are now rapidly maturing, and of which about twenty millions are now matured and due on two roads, the balance coming in two years, and which will have to be paid by the Government—they propose to furnish the money to extinguish those bonds, to stop the Government paying interest to carry them along.

Now, take the Hubbard plan for the eighty-three years, and you have $760,000 a year interest for eighty-three years, which amounts to $63,422,000. Adding that to your principal of $38,000,000 gives a total of $101,628,000.

It will be observed that under the Pierce plan the Government will receive $144,000,000. Let us see how the plan adopted by the committee will work out. Under this, we take a second mortgage for $55,000,000 on the Union Pacific Railroad. The interest on this $55,000,000 for eighty-three years is $50,000,000, making a total payment, in interest and in the extinguishment of the debt, of $105,000,000. But in order to do that, in order to carry the balance of the subsidy bonds which the Government must carry, practically $16,000,000—I put it down low: I give them every advantage—these bonds must be carried at an interest of 3½ per cent, if we take the average of the last bond sale, which is the only thing we have to go by, the interest on that $16,000,000 at 3½ per cent for eighty-three years is $46,000,000, and that added to the subsidy bonds that yet must be paid, requires the Government to pay $62,480,000 to carry our part of this debt alone. That is, the difference between what the Government has to pay and that which the railroad company is to pay must be the profits and the sum total of the payments that are to be made in the discharge of this debt. interest on this $55,000,000 for eighty-three years is $50,000,000, this debt.

In the Powers bill they pay $105,000,000. The Government pays $62,000,000, leaving the net sum of $43,000,000 at the end of eighty-three years to discharge a debt that is to-day $55,000,000. If they will pay into the Treasury of the United States $29,000,000 in cash, it is a better proposition than is contained in this bill. The present worth of that money is about $29,000,000. In the Pierce plan that same element exists. The Government must carry along that $16,000,000 of bonds. Under the Pierce bill the Government receives $144,000,000. It cost the Government $62,000,000, leaving a balance to the Government of $82,000,000. Now subtract the difference between what the Government receives under the Pierce plan and what it receives under the present plan, and there is a difference of $39,000,000 in cash to the Government in favor of the Pierce plan.

It is still worse under the Hubbard plan. Under that the Government only receives $101,000,000, without carrying the $16,000,000 of subsidy bonds along. That is eliminated, and you have to subof subsidy bonds along. That is eliminated, and you have to subtract nothing from the $101,000,000 that he pays in eighty-three years except the $43,000,000 that the Government gets under the present plan, and that leaves you $58,000,000 in favor of the Hubbard plan over the one adopted by the committee and sought to be passed through this House. The same argument applies to the Central Pacific, only more so. The same condition exists there, and they could comply with it. General Hubbard never gave up his position that the Central Pacific could not carry out this plan, and afterwards submitted a draft of a bill for the purpose of carrying this method out. The Union Pacific assented to the Hubbard plan and said they could and would carry it out although it. plan and said they could and would carry it out, although it would be hard for the Union Pacific to match the peerless Central Pacific.

It is worthy of notice that the cost of transportation is more than ample to pay the interest of 2 per cent on these bonds. The companies were both asked to make a similar proposition. Just why I do not know. I do not see that it was necessary that they should both make the same proposition and the same terms. But if they must do that it is clear that those terms must be such only as the poorer could afford.

Since, however, this bill treats both alike, which if it be just to each is a marvelous coincidence, and as a basis for a judgment of the claim that it has been hard for the Union Pacific to match the Central, we submit the following brief comparison of the Union and Central Pacific.

and Central Pacific.

The proposed reorganized Union and Kansas Pacific (they are now consolidated) will be between 1,800 and 1,900 miles long; the aided Central is about half as long. The former owes the Government a principal debt of $33,500,000, with a sinking fund of nearly $17,000,000 to apply in reduction. The Central owes the Government a principal debt of nearly $28,000,000, with a sinking fund of about $7,000,000 to apply. The former has paid the Government on bond and interest account, to go in reduction of unreimbursed interest paid by Government on subsidy bonds, about $20,000,000; the latter less than $8,000,000. The unreimbursed interest already paid by the Government on the subsidy bonds issued to the former company is about $35,000,000, and on those to issued to the former company is about $35,000,000, and on those to the latter it is about $34,500,000.

The present balance of indebtedness from the former to the Government is about $52,000,000 (it will mature at about $55,000,000), and that of the latter about $58,000,000. The net earnings of the former while undergoing dismemberment in the hands of receivers, in the darkest railroad year in our history—year before last—were $4,315,000. Last year they were $4,800,000. And those And those of the Central for the same years, respectively, were apparently about half as much, but Mr. Tweed said that after taking out interest on first bonds and about $530,000 for present sinking fund the earnings of the Central in 1894 were $144,000, and in 1895

The former company (the Union) has millions of collateral resources; the Central is leased to the Southern Pacific, and has nothing but a rental of its earnings. The Union Pacific could refund its first-mortgage and whole Government debt in 4 percents, imposing a charge much within its average net income. was put into the hands of receivers by its stockholding interest, and but for its guaranty of interest and dividends on the bonds and on stock of other but unsubsidized roads need never have failed at all.

A man simply does not know what he is talking about when he says that the Union Pacific is not stronger financially than the Central Pacific. As to which of the two companies showed the most strength there is no room for doubt, because the negotiation offering the same terms to each was carried to a point where the Central broke down, or said it must do so, and the Union still stood up.

The very last time I saw Mr. Pierce, the attorney for the Union Pacific, I told him that I could not agree to this bill which had been introduced here, and he asked me if I would not urge as a substitute his last proposition, to redeem the subsidy bonds and give the income mortgage for the $38,000,000 of unreimbursed interest.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it would be useless to follow these figures further, but I will present them in another way, for I know how members feel when they are tangled up without warning in a maze of figures like these. If the Central Pacific would pay these subsidy bonds and then pay $800,000 a year interest on their income bonds, it would be worth to the Government just the same as if they paid $1,500,000 a year under this bill. If the Union Pacific would discharge the subsidy bonds and pay $760,000 a year, that would be equal to the payment of $1,350,000 a year under this bill.

under this bill.

Again, putting it another way, take the Union Pacific debt at $55,000,000; under this bill the Government receives the first year 2 per cent interest on that, or $1,100,000. But in order to do that we must carry, say, $16.000,000 of subsidy bonds. That, at $\frac{3}{2}$ per cent, is $600,000. The Government receives for interest $1,100,000, and it pays out for interest, say, $600,000. That leaves $500,000 interest which the Government gets. Under the Hubbard plan the payment made for interest would be $760,000 a year; while under this plan we receive $500,000, making a difference of $260,000 a year in favor of the Hubbard plan. This is a simple matter; it is not like figuring out a tariff schedule: it is a simple matter of is not like figuring out a tariff schedule; it is a simple matter of mathematical calculation.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Why was not the proposition accepted?

Mr. HUBBARD. The gentleman will have to ask that question of some other member of the committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, another statement in regard to this bill in this connection. The bill is not so good, even, as the existing law. Under the requirements of laws now on the statute book, the Union Pacific Company has paid to the Government $1,500,000 a year on an average since 1879.

Mr. BARHAM. Under the Thurman Act? Mr. HUBBARD. Yes; since the Thurman Yes; since the Thurman Act went into oper-Gentlemen will remember that our principal debt has not ation. Gentlemen will remember that our principal debt has not diminished. It has remained just what it was, less this Union Pacific sinking fund of $17,000,000. The annual average payment of the Union Pacific has been $1,500,000, while under the bill here proposed the annual payment would be only $1,250,000. Not only that; the $1,250,000 would pay not merely the interest, but would extinguish the debt as well, in eighty-three years. It is idle to dwell longer upon these figures. They are too plain.

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the conditions that surround these railroads and the security that ought to be taken to preserve the interest of the Government in that property.

taken to preserve the interest of the Government in that property. You can not expect this money to be paid. There is nobody who can assemble a sufficient amount of money to discharge this debt, especially the first and second mortgages. Now look at the situation. The Union Pacific road, just before it reaches Ogden, and at Granger, joins the Oregon Short Line. That road practically parallels the Central Pacific to the coast. The Central Pacific, coming east, meets at Ogden the Rio Grande Western and the Denver and Rio Grande, which, in connection with the Missouri Pacific, the Burlington, or with the Rock Island and Pacific, parallels the Union Pacific to the Missouri River.

Whatever value may attach to any security that the Government takes from the Central Pacific will be measured by the indissolubility of the tie of the Central Pacific with the Union Pacific. Once put it into the power of each of these roads to carry on competition with each other, and either one of them can be "bottled up" until even the first mortgage will not be worth a continental. Suppose that in the future the Central Pacific—not the Union, not both roads, but just the Central—should fail, how much would the Government's $60,000,000 second-mortgage. how much would the Government's $60,000,000 second-mortgage lien be worth? All that would be necessary would be for the Union Pacific to join with the Oregon Short Line (and that road was, until the Union Pacific went into the hands of a receiver, under the control of the Union Pacific)—all that would be necessary would be for the Union Pacific road to join with the Oregon Short Line and thus bottle up the Central so that the Government

The same is true of the Union Pacific. It also could be bottled up, because the Fremont, Elkhorn and Missouri Valley runs out to Caspar, Wyo., going through the northern part of Nebraska, and, by building about 150 miles of road, that line also could reach the Oregon Short Line, so that there would be not only two or three competing lines on the south, but also another one on the north. In that way the Union Pacific would absolutely be bottled up, so that the Government could not get anything out of it. But, fortunately for the Government, fortunately for the people, those roads have both failed, and now, if we avail ourselves of the opportunity, we can put them in a condition so that one mortgage shall extend over the entire line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean.

Pacific Ocean.

I would not insist on a high rate of interest. Whatever these railroads pay to the Government in the future must be paid from charges levied on the people and the property along their lines, and if the Government can keep supervision over them, so as to compel them to give the people reasonable rates and prevent them from making exorbitant charges, then it will not be necessary to insist on a high rate of interest. It is better in the first place to have your debt secured than it is to have a big rate of interest, which the roads can not carry. Why these roads were ever permitted to be separate I am unable to explain. It would be as wise to now divide the Union Pacific at the North Platte.

Mr. NORTHWAY. A single question, if the gentleman will allow me. It has been said or intimated by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Powers] that these are separate corporations and that it is not possible to get one consolidated mortgage. Will the gentleman kindly explain whether that is possible or not?

Mr. HUBBARD. That is one of the conditions under which the companies come to us. They say the companies have nothing whatever to do with each other.

The suggestion that the various companies owning these roads have no relation to each other as companies, and do not want to be mixed up with each other in their settlements with the Government, is wholly irrelevant. If we have a controlling mortgage on each of the two halves or four quarters of a railroad that is worth enough as a whole to pay all the debts of every part, we do not mix up the mortgagors by refusing to compromise with any of them for 50 cents on the dollar. This is not our side of the

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. What does the gentleman mean by the expression "a controlling mortgage?"

Mr. HUBBARD. The Government is the greatest creditor of these roads. It is assumed that the party who has the most money these roads. It is assumed that the party who has the most money involved in a given piece of property, and who in that way holds the controlling mortgage, will not let it go, but will take advantage of his control before consenting to lose his money.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Do you mean that the party that holds the highest amount of indebtedness will control the property?

Mr. HUBBARD. Not processerily in every case.

Mr. HUBBARD. Not necessarily in every case.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. The gentleman's expression struck me as a rather odd one.

as a rather odd one.

Mr. HUBBARD. By a controlling mortgage I mean that the Government holds the largest amount of the indebtedness.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I would like to have the gentleman's definition of a "controlling mortgage."

Mr. HUBBARD. It is this—that the Government does not propose to see this debt extinguished without payment when it has so large an interest in this proposition.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. In other words, the Government, in order to save itself, as the matter now stands must assume still further indebtedness.

further indebtedness

Mr. HUBBARD. I do not know that it is necessary to do that. The Government owns the controlling mortgage on these lines.

The Government owns the controlling mortgage on these lines. Not only that, but there is the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad and the Central Branch of the Union Pacific. About $7,000,000 is due from both those roads. The subsidy was granted at the same time as it was to the main lines. But those lines were not even considered in the committee. We do not know what they propose to do with them—whether to give them away or just to let them "hang fire." All these roads ought to have been before the committee and treated the same way. They ought all to be put up and sold and the first mortgage cleared off.

The gentleman from Vermont says it will take $60,000,000 or $70,000,000 to clear off the incumbrances that precede the Government lien. With the application of the sinking fund that is available for the discharge of the debts of these companies, the United States can, with less than $30,000,000, have a clean title to that road, including the terminals and everything else from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean. That does not mean Government ownership of railroads, but the Government has the power to bring those roads to a foreclosure, so that men who have power to bring those roads to a foreclosure, so that men who have business qualifications, who have the capital and the brains to run these roads, may take hold of them. If such men come here and ask the Government what it has to sell and the Government replies that it has an equity in these roads, that offers no sufficient inducement to capitalists. People do not run into the purchase of equities very fast. But if you tell them that you have a clear railroad from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, that there is not a dollar against it, and ask them what they will give for it, I guarantee you will have bidders for these properties offering much better terms to the Government than those embodied in this bill. The net earnings of the Union Pacific Railroad for the last ten years have averaged $7,500,000 a year, yet the committee proposes to make this settlement on the hypothesis that $4,000,000 is all the money that the company can have available for the purpose of liquidating the annual interest charges after paying operating expenses and taxes.

With these railroads united and with the Central Pacific cut loose from the lease that it has made with the Southern Pacific of Kentucky, what would be the situation? Now, I want to call attention to the statement of one of the Government directors, and a receiver of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, in regard to the freights hauled by the Central Pacific. He ought to know something about this matter. He is a man who has given his life almost to the attempt to save the interest of the Government in these roads. I refer to Mr. E. Ellery Anderson. He says that we ought to foreclose. But let me read his exact statement as made before the Senate Committee on Pacific Railroads:

Senator Stewart. You suggest that if the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific were sold together, the line would be more valuable than if they were sold separately?

Mr. Anderson. Yes.
Senator Stewart. Would that be because it would have a monopoly as against those other roads that are attempting to get to the Pacific Ocean?

Mr. Anderson. There would be no monopoly; but the Union Pacific orrolling the Central Pacific, would be protected from the plans of construction which now exist in those several other roads, and would also be able to take for itself a larger portion of the California business than it now obtains. Our relations to the Central Pacific are friendly and pleasant in many ways; but they naturally take all they can by the Southern road, and only give us what is necessary to preserve friendly relations with us; whereas, if we owned the Central Pacific, we would take very much more business than the Central Pacific now gives us.

That is the testimony of a man who knows something. the evidence that comes to show that these roads ought to be united. So far as the line of the Central Pacific and the Southern Pacific of Kentucky is concerned-and understand that that is not a railroad company; it is not a railroad corporation-it does not own a mile of railroad; it was not a purchase of capital stock in the road, but it was trade of stock in the road for the purpose of securing a controlling interest, and it is an arrangement that could be dissolved at any time. Whatever benefit possible to accrue from the Southern Pacific Company to the Government under this bill could go up into the air at any moment.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HUBBARD. Certainly.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. How is it possible, I would ask the gentleman, by any legislation of this Congress to unite the

Mr. HUBBARD. Am I urging any such legislation?
Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. I understand you to suggest that they should be united.

that they should be united.

Mr. HUBBARD. Certainly. That is one of the features—one of the objections to your bill. It does not unite them.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. But that is just the question I ask you. How can they be united by any legislation?

Mr. HUBBARD. We are not suggesting legislation for that purpose; we are only combating your bill.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Let me ask the gentleman how he prepages to make the many statements.

proposes to unite them?

Mr. HUBBARD. I am not making any such proposition.
Mr. WATSON of Ohio. But you say you are combating the bill because you claim that it does not propose to unite them.
Now, if you propose to combat the bill on that ground, you are bound, in good faith, to show how the bill could accomplish that purpose, and how they could be united. I think myself that ought to be done. And if it could be done, I would vote for the proposition in a minute.

Mr. HUBBARD. I say let the Government proceed as the President is proceeding—

Mr. BARHAM. That is it.

Mr. HUBBARD (continuing). Let him proceed to clear off the first mortgages; and let me say to the gentleman that it would require less than $30,000,000 to do it. We have then the united road from Omaha to the Pacific Ocean.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. But they are not any more united than

Mr. HUBBARD. Wait a moment; I am making the statement against the argument of the gentleman from Vermont. I say that you will have a united road from Council Bluffs, Iowa, to the Pacific Ocean, including the terminal at Council Bluffs, Iowa, and including the terminal at Kansas City, Mo. It will be taking all of the liens made by the Union Pacific, for what purpose I do not know, and the line can be extended from Kansas to Cheyenne, by way of Denver, without the expenditure of a dollar. And I deny the position of the gentleman, both as a matter of fact and of law, that the lien of the Government does not attach to the terminals.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me a question? Mr. HUBBARD. In a moment. It covers the terminals at Omaha; it covers the bridge; it is a continuous line from the point fixed by the President, in pursuance of the acts of 1862 and 1864, and the Government lien extends to all.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Does not the gentleman from Missouri know that the Supreme Court has decided that the Government lien extends to any of the bond-aided portions of the road?

Mr. HUBBARD. On the contrary, I am aware of nothing of Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Do you deny it?

Mr. HUBBARD. As a matter of fact and as a matter of law, as to the Supreme Court decisions you are wrong.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. Do you deny that the court has so decided?

Mr. BARHAM. I do.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. I am asking the gentleman from Mis-

Mr. HUBBARD. I construct it differently. I say that the decision of the Supreme Court saying the lien did not extend farther than 394 miles was as clear a decision as was ever given. There can be no question about it. It does not extend west of the three hundredth milepost.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to conclude his remarks.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. HEPBURN. Amoment, before the consent is given. is not to encroach upon the arrangement already made? It sim-

The CHAIRMAN. That is all.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. That decision was correct; it was right; it was law. The reason why the line of railroad west of the three hundred and ninety-fourth milepost to Cheyenne by way of Denver can be subjected to the Government mortgage without costing a dollar I will explain in a few minutes. The United States Supreme Court has never decided that the lien of the Government does not extend to the Omaha bridge and to the terminals at Kansas City and at Council Bluffs. It has never passed upon that question. You can not cite a decision of the United States Supreme Court in which it has decided that in any way, shape, or form. It never has been passed on; but I will tell you what was done. After that proceeding of 1887, they took advantage of that, and have been insisting all the time since that the Government had religious exerct ways such specific miles as its means had. ment had no lien except upon such specific miles as its money had gone into. In other words, if the money of the Government went into 20 miles of road here, and did not go into 20 miles at another place, the railroad companies have been insisting that the lien of place, the railroad companies have been insisting that the lien of the Government did not attach to the last property.

I say that that position is absurd. The officials of the Govern-ment, the men who have had the interests of the Government in their care, to guard them against these Pacific railroads, seem to have acquiesced in that opinion that the Government lien did not attach; but understand that acquiescence does not make nor construe law. Then the question came up on the earnings of the Omaha bridge. If the Omaha Bridge was not a part of the Union Pacific system, if the Government had no lien on that, as it had not on that line west of the three hundred and ninety-fourth milepost, then that the earnings on that bridge should not have been attached under the 25 per cent net earnings fixed by the Thurman Act. Not a dollar of the Government's money went into that bridge. You all understand that. The railroad company brought a suit for the purpose of testing that, but they never pressed their suit. Why did they not?

The Supreme Court of the United States has declared strongly and specifically, in language that could not be improved upon, that the Union Pacific Railroad commences at Council Bluffs, in that the Umon Pacific Raifroad commences at Council Biulis, in Iowa, includes the Omaha Bridge, and runs to a point 5 miles west of Ogden; and if the Government lien does not attach to that, the Supreme Court will have to reverse itself.

Mr. WATSON of Ohio. In what case was that decided?

Mr. BARHAM. In 91 U. S., 343.

Mr. HUBBARD. The case of Hall vs. Union Pacific Railroad.

Now, in regard to the property west of the three hundred and ninety-fourth mile post, the Denver extension and the Denver Pacific Railroad, or the Cheyenne Division, as it is sometimes called: As appears from the statement of the gentleman who presented the report and the bill from the committee, the reason why the Government is to raise, as it were, its present lien a little bit higher and permit, in so far as the Union Pacific Railroad Company is concerned, the putting of an additional first-mortgage lien of $21,000,000 beneath us, was because the Government was securing property against which we had now no lien, and which was worth many million dollars.

Now I want to take one of the trusts, the tenth, as it is given in Poor's Manual.

This trust is a mortgage to Russell Sage and George J. Gould to secure mortgage bonds to the authorized amount of $30,000,000, of which amount about $11,000,000 has been issued and are outstanding. It is called the consolidated mortgage. It covers the Kansas Pacific from Kansas City to Denver. It is subject to the first mortgage and Government lien on the Eastern and Middle of the Kansas Pacific—the Eastern Division extending from Kansas City west to the one hundred and fortieth milepost and the Middle Division from the one hundred and fortieth to the three hundred and ninety-fourth milepost. consolidated mortgage is a third mortgage on the Eastern Division, a fourth mortgage on the Middle Division, a second mortgage on the Denver Extension, and a mortgage on the terminals at Kansas City, but we do not know the order of its lien on the terminals.

It is also a first mortgage on one and a second mortgage on another large body of land and land contracts, and is further secured by the pledge with the trustees of a good many millions in par of stocks and bonds, including a little less than $1,000,000 of the stocks and bonds, including a little less than $1,000,000 of the bonds on the Cheyenne Division.

The third mortgage on the Middle Division, which precedes it, is an income mortgage of about $5,000,000, but all of those income bonds except $20,000 appear to be up as collateral to the consolidated mortgage itself. The mortgage which precedes it on the Denver Extension secures bonds outstanding on that extension to the amount of $5,887,000, but the Denver Extension mortgage securing these bonds is also secured by a first mortgage on one of the bodies of land covered by the consolidated mortgage and by a sinking fund, which are sufficient to pay off the Denver Extension. the bodies of land covered by the consolidated mortgage and by a sinking fund, which are sufficient to pay off the Denver Extension mortgage and yield a surplus to go to the security of the consolidated mortgage of nearly $5,000,000. This surplus, with the lands on which the consolidated mortgage is a first lieu (and the land contracts), are, as stated by the company, of sufficient value to pay off the consolidated mortgage to within $2,415,679.22. This would free the $5,000,000 income bonds on the Middle Division and allow them to be expected and there would still be left to make good the them to be canceled, and there would still be left, to make good the them to be canceled, and there would still be left, to make good the above deficit on the consolidated mortgage, other bonds pledged under it to the par value of $4,314,000 and stocks to the amount of $1,797,500 more. So that there would seem to be a premium in assuming the consolidated mortgage, besides freeing the Denver Extension wholly, and the Cheyenne Division for the most part, from any mortgage whatever; but if not, then we may turn to another of the trusts—the third or 8 per cent sinking-fund trust, in which there is a clear surplus of nearly $3,000,000.

Wherefore, in any event, if the Government can reach these assets or has any lien under the Thurman Act or otherwise, even on the equity or right to redeem it is easy to give to the Government.

the equity or right to redeem, it is easy to give to the Government the equity or right to redeem, it is easy to give to the Government the property the company purports to contribute for the completion of the Kansas Pacific system, and seemingly free from all mortgages and without cost. But it may be said this is not all; that there is the Union Pacific Railway Company Kansas Division and collateral mortgage of $5,000,000 mentioned in the Drexel-Morgan securities. This, it is true, purports to rest upon the Kansas Pacific Division clear through to Cheyenne. It was made in May, 1891. In respect to this mortgage Mr. Pierce made a somewhat startling claim. He said:

The $5,000,000 of Kansas Division and collateral trust 5 per cent bonds are

The $5,000,000 of Kansas Division and collateral trust 5 per cent bonds are secured by mortgage to the Mercantile Trust Company, and constitute a lien on the entire Kansas and Cheyenne divisions. It is also the claim of that mortgage that it constitutes a first lien on the equipment on that part of the property, inasmuch as all the equipment which had originally been bought by the constituent companies consolidated into the present Union Pacific Railway Company had been worn out, and the present equipment was purchased by the present consolidated company—the Union Pacific Railway Company. Company

If that is the effect of consolidation upon prior mortgages that included the rolling stock of the constituent companies, we think the information will astonish investors. It is timely for us, however, for the proposed mortgages in the bill do not cover afterever, for the proposed mortgages in the bill do not cover afteracquired property; or if so, that would not seem to matter in the event of any consolidation. An amendment, put into this bill on motion of my friend from Iowa [Mr. Hepbun], intended to secure equal privileges to all companies that should build lines to connect with these Pacific roads, impliedly gives to them the power to enter into any consolidation not in conflict with the terms of that amendment. We assume that the present equipment of these companies will be worn out long before our claim will be paid under this bill, and a good way to release new equipment from the Government lien will be to consolidate with somebody.

But glance at the history of this five-million-dollar mortgage. It contains the curious provision that it may be further secured at the election of the company by the pledge of all or any of the following mortgage bonds:

mg mortgage bonds.
Colorado Central Railroad Company Oregon Short Line and Utah Northern consolidated first-mortgage	$1,378,000
bondsOregon Short Line and Utah Northern collateral trust	1,810,000
Union Pacific, Denver and Gulf consolidated first-mortgage bonds Utah and Northern
Utah Southern Railroad Extension Company	898,000

These securities were worth much more than the $5,000,000 to which they were to be collateral, and were more salable, too. Indeed, the $5,000,000 were not sold, any of them; but, with the foregoing optional collaterals, were apparently, only four months later, all put up with the Drexel-Morgan loan, from which, the indications are, a large part of them has been sold; but, in any event, a taking up of the Drexel-Morgan loan would release any collateral to the five-million-dollar loan, for all of the bonds of that loan itself would be released.

This kind of financiering seems, on the slightest examination, to have been guided by no business foresight or prudence.

We are aware that such transactions lend some little color to the rumor that the Pacific roads have been fixed to meet the Government claim. We do not think they warrant such a charge. We do, however, submit that the making of bonds unsalable and never to be sold, even seemingly absurd bonds like the foregoing and the income bonds on the Middle Division of the Kansas Pacific, and other bonds to be pledged and themselves to be secured at the option of the company, by large amounts of salable bonds, challenge attention. They indicate that the right key to the right trust unlocks many millions of bonds in excess of the debt secured, which bonds in turn dissolve other trusts, whose securities, thus freed, release one mortgage after another, and so on.

In short, if there had been a design to embarrass the company by unnecessary incumbrances as foundation for extraordinary claims, and to create trusts to secure bonds never to be issued, and to stuff the trusts with securities which it was desirable to protect, assert, or cover for a time, and then get rid of or retain, those purposes could have been accomplished by mortgages and trusts such as are manifest here, which, nevertheless, in this instance, we have but little doubt will be found to have been availed of for fair purposes

However, I do not know. It is impossible to get full informa-tion in regard to these roads. You have to get your information from half a dozen different books, from newspaper clippings, and from the wind and streets.

Just a few words at this time in regard to the pending bill. The gentleman from Vermont was asked the very pertinent question why the bill did not include the personal property, stocks, and bonds of the Union Pacific Company, as it included those of the Central Pacific, and he said that it did. I deny that statement. It does not do anything of the kind. It covers the personal property, stocks, and bonds of the Central Pacific, and that company has not a stock or bond to its name. It is leased to the Southern Pacific of Kentucky, and depends upon its rental for its income. The Union Pacific, on the other hand, is not required by this bill to mortgage any of its bonds or stocks, and it has millions of them. There are nine y-odd millions, par value, up behind that Drexel mortgage alone, although there are only about $8,500,000 of that loan outstanding to-day. There was an authorized issue of $24,000,000, an actual issue of $18,000,000 or $19,000,000, and the property down to $8,500,000. or $24,000,000, an actual issue of $18,000,000 or $19,000,000, and the amount outstanding has been brought down to $8,500,000. My report says that the amount was $11,000,000 last year, but it has been reduced so that it is now only about $8,500,000, and proceedings have been already instituted to foreclose that trust in order to eliminate the claim of the Government. Lest the Government should have any right in equity to redeem that property, the foreclosure is going on, in order to put the property beyond our reach in this settlement.

This bill, I say, does not require the Union Pacific to mortgage its bonds and stocks. The bill further permits the Central Pacific Railroad Company to remain under lease to the Southern Pacific of Kentucky, which is certainly in violation of laws passed by several of the States, and in violation of a principle which has been recognized even by Congress, feeble as it has been in its effort to legislate to prohibit the consolidation of parallel or competing

lines of road.

This bill, I say, permits that to be continued and carried on. The time that the bonds are to run under this mortgage is eighty-six years for the Central Pacific and eighty-three years for the Union Pacific, taking a second-mortgage 2 per cent bond, which is practically worthless, and giving away these properties, because if they should fail again it would require over a hundred million dollars to come in and clean off the underlying mortgage, whereas now it can be cleaned off for less than thirty millions and give the Government a clear road to sell. The bill is inadequate to guard the interests of the Government, delusive, and visionary, and the results of its practical amplication will be to destroy, not conserve. results of its practical application will be to destroy, not conserve, the rights it vainly assumes to protect.

I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Hainer of Nebraska having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 7945) to provide for the entry of lands in Greer County, Okla., to give preference rights to settlers, and for other

A bill (H. R. 5407) to remove the charge of desertion now standing against Oscar A. Bulette, known in his military title as Austin Bulette, late private in Company E, Fifty-second Illinois Infantry

Volunteers, during late war;
A bill (H. R. 7777) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to furnish condemned cannon to Fort Thomas, Ky.; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 205) authorizing the building of a telephone line in the District of Columbia. The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was

A bill (S. 3328) to amend an act entitled "An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes;" and A bill (S. 1781) making an appropriation to furnish flags for the schoolhouses of the District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 3719) to provide for appointment by brevet of active or retired officers of the United States Army in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

PACIFIC RAILROAD BILL.

The committee again resumed its session.

Mr. Bell of Texas rose.

Mr. Powers was recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Vermont yield?

Mr. POWERS. I do not yield to anyone, Mr. Chairman, but I understand that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard] yields to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell].

Mr. HUBBARD. That is right.

Mr. BELL of Texas. I suppose that I had a right to the floor as a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time is controlled by the gentleman from Vermont on the one side and by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hubbard] on the other.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I am aware that a great number of gentlemen whose constituents are much more directly interested in the proper settlement of the Pacific railroad debts than are those whom I represent desire to address the committee on the pending measure, and I should not occupy any of the limited time which has been allowed for debate but for the fact that I think the gentleman from Vermont has fallen into error as to many of the propositions which he has submitted. Most of what I have to say will be directed to attempting to correct some of the erroneous impressions which, I fear, his remarks might have created.

To begin with, as a member of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, I of course, in common with others, have become somewhat familiar with the details of the legislation proposed by this bill and with the previous legislation on the subject, as well as with the history of the construction of the subsidized railroads and their subsequent operations.

The gentleman who opened the discussion [Mr. Powers] has very clearly and fairly stated the history of the legislation authorizing the building of the roads, but in order that my remarks may be reasonably complete I desire to repeat briefly some of the things which he has so well said:

The act of Congress approved July 1, 1862, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds to certain companies named therein, which bonds were to be a loan to them, and to secure the payment of which, together with the interest thereon, the Government was to have a first lien on the roadbed, the property of the companies, to aid in the construction of which the bonds were issued. No work was done under t is law.

By the act approved July 2, 1864, the companies were authorized to issue first-lien mortgage bonds of even tenor, date, and amount of the Government bonds, and the lien of the Government was to be subordinate thereto.

The Government was to retain one-half of all the compensation for services rendered it by the several companies, which sum, together with an amount equal to 5 per cent of their net earnings, was to be applied to the payment of the said bonds and interest. Five companies accepted the benefits of the act. They were from Atchison, Kans., 100 miles westerly, and to which were issued subsidy bonds to the amount of 1,600,000

As it is not proposed in this bill to legislate with reference to these properties, it is not necessary to go further into details with reference to them.

The Union Pacific, which extends from Omaha, Nebr., to Ogden, Utah, a distance of 1,038.68 miles, and to which were issued subsidy bonds to the amount of $27,236,512

The Kansas Pacific, which extends from Kansas City,

Kans., westward 393.94 miles, and to which were issued subsidy bonds to the amount of..... 6, 303, 000

33, 539, 512

These two companies have been consolidated and are now parts of the Union Pacific Railway system, and in the subsequent discussion I shall refer to them collectively as the Union Pacific Railway Company.

The Western Pacific, which was absorbed at an early date by the Central Pacific, the two roads constitut-ing a continuous line from San Jose, Cal., to Ogden, Utah, a distance of 860.66 miles, and to the two companies, which are designated as the Central Pacific, bonds were issued to the amount of ...

It was thought when the bonds loaned the companies were issued that the one-half of the compensation due by the Government for services rendered it by the respective companies and the 5 per cent of the net earnings which was to be applied to the payment of the bonds and interest as stated would pay the interest and supply something to be devoted to the gradual extinction of the debt due the United States.

This proved to be a delusion, and the companies having failed This proved to be a delusion, and the companies having failed to keep the interest paid, a suit was instituted to recover judement for the amount they were in default. It was decided by tgh Supreme Court in 1875, in the case of the United States vs. The Union Pacific Railway Company (91 U. S., 72), that the interest paid by the Government was not due from the companies until the bonds matured.

As the companies made no effort to provide a fund with which to discharge their indebtedness secured by the prior lien on the property upon which the Government had a lien, or to satisfy the government had a lien had a li erry upon which the Government had a hen, or to satisfy the Government's debt when it should become due, and as it was rapidly increasing owing to the fact that the interest it was paying annually largely exceeded the amounts paid by the companies, it was apparent that the claims against the subsidized portions of the roads would, before the Government debt matured, amount to make heart they also of the property whom which the Government. much more than the value of the property upon which the Govern-ment had a lien to secure its debt.

In 1878, by what is known as the Thurman Act, in order that a sinking fund might be accumulated with which to pay off the debts of the companies when they should become due, it was provided that the whole amount of compensation due to the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railway companies, respectively, for the services rendered for the Government should be retained, one half to be applied to the liquidation of the interest paid by the United States upon the bonds loaned the said companies and the other half to be turned into a sinking fund. By the same act, in addition to the 5 per cent of their net earnings which was to be applied to the payment of the interest on the bonds, as I have explained, the said companies were required to pay into the sinking fund a certain portion of their net earnings. The amounts paid into the sinking fund were to be invested in bonds of the United States, and the semiannual income thereof was to be in like manner invested, and the fund thus accumulated was to be held for the protection, security, and benefit of the lawful and just holders of any mortgage or lien debts of said companies, respectively, paramount to the rights of the United States. This law, having been tested in the courts and having been held to be a proper exercise of legislative authority, has been enforced, and consequently there has been accumulated in the sinking fund and is held in the United has been accumulated in the sinking fund and is held in the United States Treasury securities and cash which is now available for the purpose of paying off the mortgage debts of the Central Pacific Railroad Company $6,493,126.94, and of the Union Pacific Railroad Company $15,825,985.63.

It is proposed by the bill reported by the committee to apply the amounts in the respective sinking funds to the extinguishment pro tanto of the Government's debt, and to this suggestion there can be no chiestion.

can be no objection.

A careful computation of the amounts which would be due the Government on the 1st of January, 1897, after deducting the amount which the Government would realize from the securities in the sinking fund, shows that the Union Pacific Railroad Company will be indebted to the Government is the company will be indebted to the Government is the company will be indebted to the Government is the company will be indebted to the Government is the company will be indebted to the Government is the company will be indebted to the Government in the company will be indebted to the Government in the company will be indebted to the Government in the company will be indebted to the Government in the company will be indebted to the Government in the company will be indebted. pany will be indebted to the Government in the sum of $53,715,408.78 and the Central Pacific $57,681,514.29.

To secure the indebtedness of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Government has a lien on the 1,038.44 miles of road extending from Omaha, Nebr., to a point 5 miles west of Ogden, Utah, and on the 393.94 miles of road extending from the eastern line of the State of Kansas to a point 393.94 miles west therefrom, making in all 1,432.38 miles; but the Government lien on this property is subordinate to a prior lien to the amount of $33,532,000.

To secure the indebtedness of the Central Pacific the Government has a lien upon the 737.50 miles of railroad extending from a point 5 miles west of Ogden, Utah, to Sacramento City, Cal., and from Sacramento City to San Jose, a distance of 123.16 miles—in all, 850.66 miles—but the lien of the Government upon this property is subordinate to a prior lien of $27,855,680.

A part of the Government's debt against each road has matured and the remainder will mature in a short time; consequently it is necessary that some steps be taken to protect the interest of the Government at an early date.

About the facts which I have repeated there can be no dispute.

but I do not agree at all with the gentleman from Vermont that the owners of the stock of the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific railroad companies are in an attitude which entitles them to the least favorable consideration at the hands of this body. I did not suppose there would be anyone who would attempt to defend either the builders of these railroads or those who have subsequently operated them. The scandals that grew out of their construction, and particularly out of the construction of the Union Pacific, are a disgrace to the civilization of the age and ought to be a warning to all who might be inclined to loan the credit of our Government to the prosecution of private enterprises. I do not, however, intend to be diverted from a discussion of the real merits of the proposed settlement by questions of this kind, and would not refer to them except for the fact that it has been assumed that those who have been the beneficiaries of outrageous peculations and frauds had conferred some great favor upon our country, and especially upon that section of it which is traversed by the roads which they constructed and have subsequently wrecked.

It has been asserted that it should make no difference to us and was none of our concern, if the Government of the United States was not directly defrauded, whether the manipulators who conwas not directly defrauded, whether the manipulators who constructed the roads acquired a fortune or not. From this proposition I utterly dissent. I entirely agree that if any man by his labor, or by his superior judgment, can accumulate a fortune honestly and honorably, he ought to do so, and that he ought to be commended for doing so; but I dissent entirely from the proposition that it is honest or honorable to accumulate a fortune in building railroads, or in other public enterprises, by watering stock or issuing bonds which do not represent an actual investment. I deny that those who accumulate fortunes in this way are public benefactors, and I particularly dissent from the suggestion that we, as representatives of the people, are not interested in preventwe, as representatives of the people, are not interested in preventing such transactions, or in preventing those who have been the beneficiaries of them from enjoying the fruits of their ill-gotten gains. If gentlemen see proper to build a railroad, and if they issue stock or bonds in excess of the actual cost of the enterprise, the excess represents so much indebtedness which the public, who from the very nature of the thing are compelled to patronize the road have to pay the interest upon. If I were not anxious to explain the details of the substitute which I propose to offer for the bill, and if I had sufficient time, I would like to elaborate upon this particular subject at length; for, while I am one of those who believe that we can not have the prosperity to which we are entitled in this country under the financial legislation which now prevails, and while I believe in the injurious effects which have followed the high-tariff systems of the past, still it is my deliberate judgment that far more injurious than all these has been the effect of the fictitious debts which have been created upon our great transportation systems, and which have occasioned (and I fear will continue to occasion) the transportation charges to be so op-pressive upon our people; but I shall forego any discussion of this subject, and shall recur to the measure under consideration.

Enormous land grants were made to the railroad companies, but it is unnecessary to discuss the disposition which has been made of those lands, as they were a gift and not a loan, but so far as the subsidy bonds are concerned the case is entirely different. It was not intended, and never was suggested, that these bonds should be given to the companies, but only that they should be loaned, and it was always understood that the Government was to be repaid the entire principal and interest upon them; but it has been suggested by the gentleman from Vermont that inasmuch as there had been repaid to the United States an amount equal to the original amount of the bonds granted, that, therefore, the Government ought to deal more lemently with its debtors in collecting the remainder of its debt. It is a familiar principle of law that partial payments upon a debt must be applied first to the payment of the interest, and this was in contemplation at the time the bonds were loaned. It was expressly provided, as I have already stated, that the Government should be paid one-half of the amount that might be due the companies, respectively, for transporting mails, troops, etc., and 5 per cent of their net earnings, and these amounts were to be applied to the payment of the interest, and if there should be any surplus then it was to be applied to the payment of the principal of the indebtedness, and it was thought, as I have already stated, that these payments Government ought to deal more leniently with its debtors in colit was thought, as I have already stated, that these payments would not only extinguish the annual interest charges but would furnish something to discharge the principal of the Government's debt. If those who constructed the railroads had used the money which they realized from the sale of the bonds secured by the first mortgage, as well as from those which had been loaned by the Government, to the construction of the roads, and had issued no stock except for the money which was used in the construction of the roads, the annual charges against the companies would not have been so great but that the amounts which were to be applied under the law of 1864 to the Government's debt would have been sufficient to have paid the interest on the Government's debt, and inasmuch as that was not done, and as those who constructed the roads made use of these moneys to accumulate immense fortunes, and did do so, I think they at least are in no position to ask favors at the hands of this body.

When the Thurman Act became a law it was believed by those who passed it, as the discussion on the measure shows, that the sinking fund would be sufficiently large by the time the Government's debt matured to pay it off; and it is probable that if the roads had faithfully carried out the law such would have been the case; but as soon as the law was tested, and was sustained by the courts, efforts to divert the earnings of the companies from the sinking fund were made, and they have been very successful. So far as the Central Pacific Railroad is concerned, a lease was made to the Southern Pacific Railroad under which there could be no net earnings to amount to anything, and as to the Union Pacific, the construction of branch lines or feeders, as they are called, was undertaken, and the Union Pacific guaranteed the payment of the interest on the debts of these lines; and the result has been that very little has come into the sinking fund from either of the roads, except from the compensation due by the Government to them for services. We can well understand how this could be accomplished if we will imagine a more simple case. plished if we will imagine a more simple case. Let us suppose, for instance, that some one is the owner of a livery stable and that he is compelled to pay one-fourth of the net earnings of it to another person. Suppose, then, that the same man owns the horses and vehicles which are used in the stable, but does not have to divide any profits that may arise from their use. It can readily be seen that there would probably be a good profit on the stock and vehicles and none on the stable. And so it has been with these railroads. The same gentlemen who own the stock in the subsidized portions of the railroad systems own the stock in the feeders, as they are called, and the main line having guaranteed the payment of the charges against the auxiliary lines, they have received the benefits from the diverted traffic and an excessive proportion the benefits from the diverted traffic and an excessive proportion of the earnings of the system.

I concede that most of what I have been saying on this subject

I concede that most of what I have been saying on this subject

We must recognize the I concede that most of what I have been saying on this subject is foreign to the real question at issue. We must recognize the fact that, as a matter of law, we are confronted with conditions for which we are in nowise responsible, and must secure the best settlement we can of a debt which we did not create and the security for which was fixed by others. But I have made these statements for the purpose of showing that we are under no moral obligation to deal leniently with those who have made immense fortunes out of the bounty of the Government and who have shamefully abused the confidence and generosity of our predecessors. Nor do I agree at all with the statement that these companies have built up and turned into a garden the waste places. panies have built up and turned into a garden the waste places which formerly existed where the roads now run. It is a great mistake to suppose that the railroads make the country. The hardy and honest people who have settled up our frontiers have made the railroads possible, and the railroads have shared but not made the railroads possible, and the railroads have shared but not occasioned the prosperity, so far as it has prevailed. Prosperous communities were planted on the banks of the Mississippi and Ohio, and the fertile lands of Illinois and other Western as well as Southern States were occupied before there was a railroad.

I maintain that from the time the first contract was made for the construction of either of the roads concerning which we are now legislating, every step has been taken with a view of render-ing it more difficult, if not absolutely impossible, for the Government to collect its debt; but at the same time we are not in nearly as bad a condition as some of the gentlemen seem to imagine. For instance, it was stated by the gentleman from Vermont that inasmuch as our lien did not attach to that part of the Union Pacific road which was within 3 miles of its eastern terminus, therefore we could not use it in the event the Government should become the owner of the road, or that the purchaser of that part of the road upon which the Government has a lien could not do so. There is an express provision in section 15 of the original act chartering the road which covers this case, and no one need have the least fear of such a catastrophe as the gentleman anticipates.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman allow me a question in that connection?

Mr. BELL of Texas. Yes, sir.

Mr. POWERS. Is it not true that there was no Government aid extended to that portion of the line?

Mr. BELL of Texas. I think the gentleman is right on that point. I do not concur with the gentleman from Missouri in his contention on that score.

Mr. POWERS. The Government has no mortgage on that part the road.

Mr. BELL of Texas. So I think. I listened with interest to that part of the argument of the gentleman from Missouri and did not agree with him. That, however, is not the point to which I was referring. The contention of the gentleman from Vermont, as I understand it, was that the company could prevent the use by the Government or of any purchaser of that part of the road upon which the Government has a lien of the 31 miles of road west of its eastern terminus. It is in opposition to this theory that I called attention to the provision in the fifteenth section of the act of 1862, which covers that very case. I think, however, the general provision of law with reference to common carriers would have covered it anyway, but the provision to which I have referred is

Mr. POWERS. My position was that if we foreclose our mort-gage or seize the property of the road we could only foreclose or seize a line which would end at the Omaha Bridge.

Mr. BELL of Texas. But the gentleman went further, as I understood, and stated that the company could fence off that part of the road and we could not get into Omaha.

Mr. POWERS. What I meant was that we could not own the line beyond the point I have named.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Then I see that I misunderstood the gen-

Mr. BELL of Texas. Then I see that I mediately the gentleman's position entirely.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman consider the ninth section of the Thurman Act as void?

Mr. BELL of Texas. No. I do not.

Mr. BOATNER. Well, that expressly declares that the United States shall have a lien on the entire line of the road, and was evidently intended to correct the interpretation of the law given to it by the Supreme Court in the Kansas Pacific case.

Mr. BELL of Texas. I do not think Congress could or that it has attempted to interfere with vested rights. A mortgage that existed at the time was a lien, and Congress could not, if it desired do so, interfere with it.

Mr. BOATNER. Certainly not; but could not the ninth section of the Thurman Act be enforced without interfering with any other rights? Of course Congress can not dispossess existing liens. It can not divest them of existing rights, but could it not declare that a lien could exist to secure the entire indebtedness of

Mr. BELL of Texas. There is no controversy on that point. Mr. BOATNER. And the reason I make the suggestion was on account of the concession the gentleman has made to the posi-tion taken by the gentleman from Vermont, that the United States has no lien except on the portion of the line against which the

Mr. BELL of Texas. That was not the contention, as I understand, of the gentleman from Vermont. I did not understand the gentleman to claim, and I certainly do not intend to concede, that the Government has no lien on the property of the company other than that in aid of the construction of which bonds were issued. The only point that I intended to concede, and all that I understood the gentleman from Vermont to contend for, was that the Government's claim on the terminal properties was not only subject to the lien to secure the $35,000,000 debt, commonly called the first-mortgage debt, but was subject to other debts against the company. Of course, the Government could pay off all the debts of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and take all this property.

Mr. BQATNER. The gentleman from Texas was mistaken as to the contention of the gentleman from Vermont, who contended that the Government has no lien on that part of the line.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Well, I do not so understand the gentleman's contention, and state that I do not intend to concede that it is correct, if that was what he stated

But all this, Mr. Chairman, is merely preliminary to what I wish to say. After all, the whole question is a plain business proposition, and we should decide it from purely a business standpoint. We should not allow ourselves to be swayed by any prejudice against those who may have abused the generosity of our Government; nor, on the other hand, should we allow ourselves to be influenced in their favor on account of imaginary benefits which they have conferred upon our country, for as a benefits which they have conferred upon our country, for, as a matter of fact, if they have conferred any favors they have been remarkably well paid for them.

But now to come to the real merits of this controversy. It is a fact that these railroads owe an enormous debt of $112,000,000 to the Government, and to secure the payment of this debt the Government has a second mortgage on certain lines of railroad. Some people contend that the property upon which we have a second lien is not worth as much as the debt secured by the first

If this was true, then there is no occasion for us to legislate on the subject. No railroad corporation cares to pay more for property than it is worth, and if the debts secured by the first mortgage is for a greater amount than the value of the roads, it is gage is for a greater amount than the value of the roads, it is useless for the railroad companies to pretend that they are going to secure our debt by giving us a lien on other property. We would not do this in our ordinary business affairs, and certainly there has been nothing in the conduct of those who are in control of the Pacific railroads to justify us in supposing that they at this late day are going to do something as a favor that they can not be conveiled to the control of the Pacific railroads. compelled to do as a matter of law. But I do not concede the correctness of the statement that our debt is in no wise secured. We had a number of gentlemen before the committee which reported this bill, and they were persons who were entirely familiar with the subject. We asked them time and again what they thought of the value of the property. I particularly remember that Mr. Anderson, who has been connected for many years with the management of the railroad as a representative of the Government, gave it as his opinion that, so far as the Union Pacific was concerned, that part of it upon which the Government had a second lien would sell for enough to pay off the debt secured by the first mortgage and at least one-half of the Government's debt. So the Government is not absolutely without security. We are not entirely driven to the wall. We are not so far embarrassed as to justify us in surrendering our debts or settling on the terms that may be proposed by those who owe them. But what is it that this bill proposes to do? So far as the Union Pacific Railroad is concerned, the proposition is that we allow the debt which is secured by a mortgage prior to that of the Government to be increased from $33,539,512 to $54,731,000. If it is not proposed to lose our entire debt, the question is whether we would be in a better position and more able to collect it if the settlement is allowed than before. It is true that our second mortgage will cover some other property, but the trouble is that this property is not worth $21,000,000, the amount by which the debt secured by a lien prior to that of the Government is to be secured. Of course, there is a difference of opinion among gentlemen as to the value of this property. Those who appeared before the committee and gave their estimates of the value of the property did not think that the Government's position would be materially improved by the additional security.

The bill proceeds upon the theory that we ought to accept the proposition made by the railroad companies themselves instead of making a proposition of our own for them to accept or decline. No business man would ever make a settlement upon that princi-No business man would ever make a settlement upon that principle. When people are dealing with others, they get the best offer they can, instead of taking the most favorable offer from the other party to the proposed contract. We have accepted, or it is proposed that we shall accept, the offer of the railroad company, just as if they were entirely insolvent, and as if all we could do is to take what they are willing to give us. Now, I believe that by submitting a fair and reasonable offer to the companies, with the distinct and reasonable offer to the companies, with the distinct understanding that they may accept or decline it, we can reach a satisfactory adjustment of our debt; that is, an adjustment that will be satisfactory to all those who are simply trying to collect the Government's debt, instead of trying to secure legislation by which their particular section would be benefited to the exclusion of other portions of the United States. It is true that these roads have not been making satisfactory earnings for several weers past but the reasons for this are very plain. It is not to the years past, but the reasons for this are very plain. It is not to the interest of those who have managed and operated these roads that they should make money.

There are two reasons for this: First, and one which by all means should be considered, is the fact that if the roads had been making a satisfactory showing this body would not be disposed to making a satisfactory showing this body would not be disposed to settle on so liberal terms as they otherwise would; and another reason is the one which I have explained—that is, that one-fourth of the net earnings of the roads would have to go into the sinking fund. But the settlement proposed by the committee proceeds upon the theory that we should take the present net earnings of the roads as a basis for settlement, and that we should fix only such charges as the present complete of the road result asset. such charges as the present earnings of the road would meet. I think this is entirely an erroneous basis upon which to proceed. If those who own the stock in and the properties of the companies are not going to raise money in some way for the purpose of putting the corporations on a more solid basis than they are now, then we had better refuse to treat with them and let some other person get control of the property who will be disposed to do person get control of the property who will be disposed to do right by the Government. What is it that we propose to do for these companies? If they, or others who may be their successors, have to go into the market and borrow money, they would be compelled to pay probably 6 per cent per annum interest upon it.

I do not discuss the proposition to extend the debt at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, because I do not believe that proposition will meet with favorable consideration at the hands of any considerable number of the members of this body, but at the rate of 3 per cent per annum there is a saving in round numbers of $3,000,000 per annum to these companies in interest charges alone. This is a bonus greater than has ever been conferred by any government upon any corporation. It is one which we ought not to be compelled to consider the propriety of extending, but we must face the conditions as we find them. Without any fault of ours the conditions exist, and if we do not act cautiously and wisely our Government may lose its enormous dobt. So then, it is not our Government may lose its enormous debt. So, then, it is proour Government may lose its enormous deal. So, utell, it is posed that we confer upon these corporations a privilege which is equivalent to loaning them the credit of the Government, and thereby saving them $3,000,000 annually for an average period of forty-four years. What is it we ask in return? According to the bill recommended by the committee, absolutely nothing. We do forty-four years. What is it we ask in return? According to the bill recommended by the committee, absolutely nothing. We do not ask that they materially increase our security and make our debt more safe; in fact, that they do anything that will place the Government in a better condition than it has heretofore been. But I assert that we are in a position which enables us by exer-But I assert that we are in a position which enables us by exercising some degree of firmness in dealing with these corporations to compel them to deal justly with the Government in settling its debt, and if they will not do so there are others who will. I think the theory upon which the committee has proceeded—that is, that we determine what the companies can pay and accept that—is entirely wrong. We must insist, if we are going to confer the great favor of loaning our credit, and thereby enabling these companies to obtain cheap money, money, in fact, so cheap that no other company has ever been able to get money at nearly so low a -we ought to exact something considerable of them in return. But if the theory of the committee that the earning capacity of the roads affords a correct basis for determining the amount of the debt which could be placed upon them is accepted, then I maintain that what the roads can earn is not properly shown by returns

I have already explained some of the reasons for this, but I shall repeat part of what I have said. The black lines upon this map represent the main system of the Union Pacific Railway Company, while the red lines represent the feeders or auxiliary lines. testimony of the witnesses before the committee was that these short lines were operated at a loss to the main system. They were built as feeders to the main system and the payment of the fixed charges upon them was guaranteed by the Union Pacific Railway Company, and from the time the process of extension began the whole system has been drifting into bankruptcy. But if we sever the branches from the trunk and let those who own the stock and bonds of the branch lines take their property, and if the main line should then be operated in its own interest, a very different return of net earnings would become apparent. Besides, owing to the universal depression which has prevailed in our country for the last five years, railroad earnings throughout the entire country have fallen off greatly, and perhaps in no section of the country has the depression been more acute and more protracted than in that traversed by the Pacific railroads.

For these reasons, as well as others which I have already mentioned, the Union Pacific Railroad's earning capacity is not properly reflected by the recent showings. Conditions have been even more unfavorable to the Central Pacific. I have already discussed at length the motives of those who have control of the Central Pacific, but there is another reason which is even more control-ling than those I have mentioned. The Southern Pacific Railroad of Kentucky has leased the Central Pacific Railroad. It also controls the line of railroad commonly known as the Southern Pacific, which extends from California to New Orleans. Is it not plain that, not only for the purpose of having the net earnings of the Central Pacific Railway as small as possible, so as to avoid the necessity of paying a considerable amount into the sinking fund, and also so as to make as bad a showing as possible as to the earning capacity of the Central Pacific Railroad, for the purpose of influencing legislation, but also for other reasons, it would be to the interest of the Southern Pacific Company, which controls the Central Pacific, to divert as much traffic as possible from the Central Pacific road? Freight shipped over the Central Pacific from California to Ogden would at that point have to be transferred to the Union Pacific, and the Union Pacific would of course receive a part of the charges for transporting such freight. On the other hand, the Southern Pacific, having a through line, as I have stated, from the Pacific Ocean to New Orleans, would not have to divide with any other road.

Mr. HUBBARD. And from New Orleans they have a water

Mr. BELL of Texas. Yes; so I understand. For these reasons, and others which I have stated, the several roads have not been operated for years past in the interest of the roads themselves, and the showings they have been making can not be assumed as correct showings of their real earning capacity. Therefore, in any event, what they have been earning does not afford a proper test as to the terms upon which we ought to settle with them. But we ought, as I have stated, to proceed upon the theory that if those who owned the properties of the roads will not do something in some way to place us in a very materially better condition than we are at present, then we will not treat with them; and when I speak of a materially better condition, I mean in a very much better condition.

Our debt is an enormous one, and if we are not to receive Our debt is an enormous one, and if we are not to receive materially better security than we already have, we had better take what we can get as the result of a forced sale and make the best of a very bad bargain. At present if the Union Pacific Railroad Company should refuse to provide for its debts, the Government, to protect itself, will be compelled to pay in round numbers $33,000,000. If within, say, six months after the consummation of the settlement proposed in the committee's bill they should refuse to carry out the conditions of the pay obligation. should refuse to carry out the conditions of the new obligation which they have assumed, the Government, to protect itself, would have to pay off $55,000,000 indebtedness which would be secured by the lien prior to that of the Government.

Mr. POWERS. Fifty-five million dollars on the same amount of mileage of mileage.

Mr. BELL of Texas. No; $55,000,000 on the whole road.

Mr. POWERS. Then we would get the whole road.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Yes; we would get in addition to that which we would get now by paying $33,000,000 certain other property, which I do not believe would be worth near the $21,000,000 which we would have to pay for it. The portion of the road upon which we have a lien mostly runs through a very fine agricultural country. The eastern part of Kansas is perhaps as fine agricultural country as there is in the United States, whereas the western part of Kansas and Colorado, through which the other parts of the road run, is very broken and almost worthless from an agricultural standpoint. It is not susceptible of supporting a dense population, and, as all understand, the profit to a railroad company is principally derived from the local traffic, the rates on through traffic being so low that little is derived from that source. through traffic being so low that little is derived from that source. So again I say that if the additional property upon which the Government gets a lien is worth more than the $21,000,000 which we have to pay to secure it we would be benefited; if it is worth less we would be injured.

Now, as to the Central Pacific it is not assumed that we will receive any additional security except that which will be derived from having the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky guarantee the payment of its obligations. We must not confuse the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky with the Southern Pacific Company proper. The Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky is a corporation chartered by the legislature of the State of Kentucky is a corporation chartered by the legislature of the State of Kentucky. It was organized for the purpose of and is engaged in leasing and operating railroads. It does not, as I am informed, own any railroads. It simply has leased a great many railroads, and has leased and operates lines which extend from California to New Orleans. This corporation could wind up its affairs at probably an expense of a hundred thousand dollars. Suppose probably an expense of a hundred thousand dollars. Suppose that this corporation should determine six months after it had guaranteed the payment of the obligations of the Southern Pacific Railway Company that it did not wish to longer comply with its contract, the holders of the mortgages against the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky could institute suit and have the property of the Southern Pacific Railway Company of Kentucky sold; and, if the Government should obtain a judgment against it, there would be no property which would be subject to sale out of which the Government could collect its judgment. Mr. MAGUIRE. Is it not a fact that the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky, which is the company spoken of by the gentleman, has limited liability for its stockholders, and limited to a small proportion?

Mr. BELL of Texas. I must acknowledge that I did not know of that fact; but it is very easy for stockholders to transfer their stock and avoid liabilities anyway. I am not supposing an imaginary case. Practically all of the large railroad companies in the United States have at one time or other gone through the bankrupt courts, and in this way have wiped out all of their existing liabilities, except those which were secured by a lien of certain property. Those whose indebtedness was secured by a mortgage in rem generally secured payment of their debts, all others having to lose. This is the case with many of the railroad corporations in the State in which I live, and, I understand, has been the case everywhere else. Of course, if the debt is so small that it would not be profitable for the corporation to wind up its affairs and be converted into a new corporation, the debt would be paid. But it is proposed to have the Southern Pacific Company of Ken-But it is proposed to have the Southern Pacific Company of Kentucky guarantee a debt of $24,000,000. It could avoid the liability, as I have shown, and I think it is perfectly safe to assume that it would do so. I remember when Mr. Huntington, who is president of this corporation, was asked the question as to the value of the stock of the Southern Pacific Company, he stated that it had only a nominal value, and that dividends were not paid upon it. Mr. Chairman, I think the facts which I have stated show that we would not materially improve the condition of the Government and not increase to any considerable extent the prospect of the coland not increase to any considerable extent the prospect of the collection of the Government's debt by adopting the bill reported by the committee. For that reason I oppose the legislation. But I do not wish to appear in the attitude of antagonizing measures that others recommend without suggesting some other remedy.

There are three courses which naturally suggest themselves as those which ought to be pursued in attempting to settle the Pacific railroad debts.

First. That the Government should pay off the indebtedness which is secured by a prior lien, and should thus become the owner of the roads. I do not desire to enter into a discussion of the merits of this proposition. I do not at all favor the proposition that the Government should become the owner of railroads or engaged in the railroad business. I am aware that there are very few members of this body who favor that policy, and so it is useless to consume any time in attempting to antagonize it.

Second. A foreclosure of the Government lien and a sale of the property. Of course, if the property would bring the amount of the Government's debt, as well as that which is secured by the prior lien, this would be the most satisfactory way in which a settlement could be effected; but there has been no evidence before the committee, and, so far as I know, no one believes that if the property should be sold at forced sale it would bring anything like enough to satisfy the debt due us; that is, after satisfying the debt secured by the first lien. Hence, if it can be avoided, we ought not to adopt the second proposition.

Third. An extension of the debt due the Government by the respective railroads for a long period of time, at a low rate of interest. If it was likely that at a forced sale the property would bring very nearly enough to satisfy the Government's debt after paying off that which is secured by the prior lien, I should be in favor of having the Government take what it could realize and sever itself entirely from the railroad business; but the debt is so enormous that if there is any possibility of our being able to secure a reasonably satisfactory settlement, we ought to forego our individual preferences and attempt by every possible means to preserve the Government from loss.

The bill recommended by the committee provides for funding respective railroads for a long period of time, at a low rate of inter-

The bill recommended by the committee provides for funding the Government's debt at 2 per cent per annum interest. Inas-much as the Government can not obtain money at this rate, but must pay 3 per cent per annum, I do not think we ought to enter-must pay 3 per cent per annum, I do not think we ought to entertain any suggestion of a lower rate.

The other question then is, How can the company secure the Government in the collection of its debt? I have prepared a substitute for the committee's bill which I propose to offer at the proper time. This substitute provides that the moneys in the sinking fund shall be applied as a payment upon debt which is now due the Government, and that if the companies will pay off and discharge the debts which are secured by mortgage, which is prior to that of the Government, then the debt shall be extended for an average period of about forty years at 3 per cent per annum interest.

I presume everyone will agree that this settlement would be much more satisfactory and beneficial to the Government than that proposed by the committee's bill. But the question arises, Can the companies comply with the terms of the proposed substitute? I agree fully that if the present owners of the stock and properties of the companies do not propose to assess themselves or in some other way raise money for the purpose of disselves or in some other way raise money for the purpose of discharging and paying off the debts secured by the prior lien, then it can not be done; but I insist that they can and will do so. It is true that the evidence which we have had on the subject shows that the properties if sold under forced sale would not bring the amount of the debts which are secured by the first mortgage upon it and what will be owing the United States; but I am confident that in order to secure the use of the $112,000.000 at the low rate of interest of 3 per cent per annum efforts will be made, and successfully, too, to raise the money and accept the terms of the proposed substitute. If the companies would settle upon the terms I suggest, the Government would probably be able in a short time to sell its bonds; and the substitute bill expressly confers authority upon the Secretary of the Treasury to do so.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BELL of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. BOATNER. I have been very much impressed with the gentleman's proposition, but I should like to know what course he would suggest in the event the railroad companies refused to accept the proposition which his substitute contemplates.

Mr. BELL of Texas. The substitute bill provides fully for the contingency which the gentleman speaks of, and I will now disconstrigency which the gentleman speaks of, and I will now dis-cuss that particular branch of it.

The substitute provides that if within three months of the time it becomes a law the railroad companies, through their proper officers, do not signify their acceptance of the settlement proposed, officers, do not signify their acceptance of the settlement proposed, and if within a given period thereafter they do not comply with the terms of the bill, then the Attorney-General shall institute proceedings for the foreclosure of the Government's lien and proceed as directed in the act of March 3, 1837, which authorizes the proper officers to fully protect in every way the interest of the United States. It is not suggested how the United States, if it has to acquire title to the respective roads, will dispose of them. I suppose that it would be better to leave that question for subsequent legislation.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The contlement of the settlement proper officers.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The gentleman will let me suggest that the

Mr. MAGUIRE. The gentleman will let me suggest that the Attorney-General has asked for some legislation.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Yes; he asked that the venue of these suits shall be fixed in the District of Columbia. I have copied in full as a part of my substitute the bill prepared by the Attorney-General, and which has been introduced into both branches of Congress, and which confers jurisdiction upon the courts of this District to try these cases. I also embodied the suggestion of District to try these cases. I also embodied the suggestion of the Attorney-General that the foreclosure proceedings could run against each of the roads at the same time and that the two properties should be sold together.

Mr. HEPBURN. So that is included in the substitute?

Mr. BELL of Texas. Yes, sir.
Mr. TERRY. If the gentleman will permit me, instead of directing the suits for foreclosure to be brought under certain conditions, why not stand on the rights reserved under the act of 1862? Mr. BELL of Texas. We could do that, of course, if it were thought best

Mr. TERRY. It is more effective.

Mr. BELL of Texas. I do not think so. I think it would be better to have the foreclosure proceedings and have the property sold and all questions of conflicting liens adjudicated in the suit;

sold and all questions of conflicting liens adjudicated in the suit; and, besides, I do not want Congress to do anything which might be regarded as committing it in the direction of Government ownership of the railroads of this country.

Mr. TERRY. In regard to that proposition, permit me to say to the gentleman that we would be committing ourselves to no new doctrine. We would be standing on the doctrine that this Congress stood on in 1862, when it was declared that in the event of a default in the payment of the debt due the Government the Secretary of the Treasury could take possession of the roads for the use and benefit of the United States. It is, therefore, no new departure

Mr. BELL of Texas. If it be not a new departure, still I believe in repudiating that feature of the act of 1862. If it be the law, it is one which is more honored in the breach than in the observance.

Mr. Chairman, I hope I have made the propositions which are embraced in the substitute clear. I regret as much as anybody the necessity of our being compelled to even consider the proposition to refund the debts which are owing to the Government by the Pacific railroads, but we must face the conditions as we find them, and we must collect the enormous debts which are owing to the Government if we possibly can. This, I believe, we can do if we give those with whom we have to deal to understand that we propose to insist upon our rights and not allow them to dictate terms of settlement which certainly will not be beneficial to the terms of settlement which certainly will not be beneficial to the Government and which may not be creditable to us.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Missouri will yield to me for a moment, I wish to ask permission to present an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time to the bill, in order to have it now printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HUBBARD. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. PERKINS. I simply desire to present the amendment and have it printed in the RECORD, now waiving the reading of it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SHERMAN in the chair). Without objection, the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Iowa will be printed in the RECORD for the information of the House.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Arnold], if present, will be entitled to the floor under an arrangement that I have made with him.

Mr. OWENS I suggest to the gentleman that I have several amendments I desire to have printed. I ask that I may have permission to offer them now, simply to have them printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Vermont yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. POWERS. If the gentleman from Kentucky will withhold the amendments for a few minutes, I shall have no objection to his request. I want to occupy the time, if possible, until the usual hour of adjournment, and had intended to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Arnold]. I do not see him at present on the floor, and I will yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania

[Mr. Grow].

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. All the time he desires.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, not expecting to discuss any of the features of this bill, I shall not trespass long upon the attention of the committee.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell] has just given us a statement of his plan for disposing of this important question. He informs us that under all the information the committee had received, if the road was sold under foreclosure proceedings the received, if the road was sold under foreclosure proceedings the first mortgage would be paid off, and perhaps one-half the Government lien, and possibly not so much. This is all that could probably be received from the foreclosure proceedings. And yet he proposes and assures us with great confidence that moneyed men will be ready to take the road and pay off the first lien and allow the Government lien to be made first lien at 3 per cent interest. Who will invest money in the purchase of property that is not worth, by your own showing, the amount of money that would have to be invested?

Supposing, for instance, that the road should sell for $5,000, or Supposing, for instance, that the road should sell for $5,000, or $10,000, we will say; the Government lien is $2,000, the first lien is $8,000. Now, by the testimony, according to the gentleman's own statement, if sold, the $8,000 would be paid and $1,000 on the second lien. That is all the property is worth. It would bring $1,000 less than the amount of the investment. Who is going to invest money to make a first lien of our second one? Why should they make it a first lien? That is not a Yankee speculation, and if the gentleman had come from one of the New England States, where the boysserve apprenticeship in making wooden nutmegs, he would not have much confidence in such a proposition.

not have much confidence in such a proposition.

not have much confidence in such a proposition.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we represent the United States here as a board of directions, having a junior lien on property.

The reorganization of railroads has been a common thing in the country during the past few years. The first rule in reorganization is that the junior creditor must be the loser, if anybody. If the property is not worth the first lien, then the junior has no remedy. If the property is not worth both liens, the junior loses, not the first creditor. Now, we are here as junior creditors—

Mr. HUBBARD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GROW. Yes.

Mr. GROW. Yes. Mr. HUBBARD. Suppose you have a second mortgage for $10,000 on a piece of property. You are preceded by a mortgage of $8,000 on that property. If that property shows by its net earnings that it would earn a sufficient amount of money to pay a fair rate of interest, say 4 per cent, on the entire debt, would you permit the first lien to be foreclosed without bidding for it and protecting yourself?

Mr. GROW. The gentleman can make all the suppositions he pleases

Mr. HUBBARD. That is not a supposition; it is a fact.
Mr. GROW. Gentlemen can make all the suppositions they please. The gentleman himself claimed that the only basis of please. The gentleman himself claimed that the only basis of value on railroad property is its earnings, and there is no use in issuing a bond beyond what the earnings will pay interest on.

Now, the first thing in reorganizing a railroad is the question of issuing new mortgages. There may be a first, second, third, or any number of liens. The first mortgage, if the property is good for anything, is a perfectly good security. Hence first mortgages are not required to make much if any sacrifices, unless in a fair business way they might be required to reduce their rate of interest. In reorganizations everywhere the first point is the securing of the principal of each of the liens if it can be done. By reducing the rate of interest the principal of all liens may be saved ducing the rate of interest the principal of all liens may be saved. But without a reduction of the rate of interest and extension of time for payment some lien must lose. It is expected that the greatest reduction should be on the junior mortgage. Our junior mortgage has been receiving 6 per cent interest on its principal, and, as was shown by the chairman of the committee [Mr. Powers], the Government has received back an amount substantially equal to the principal invested, if there had been no interest to calculate. to the principal invested, it there had been no interest to calculate. The interest is calculated at 6 per cent, which is above the rates of interest paid by solvent debtors for a few years back. Six per cent is the interest reckoned to make up the sum that these people owe the Government. The junior creditor has been receiving a greater amount of interest on its money than his money was worth. Its principal has been paid back. What is owing row is only an accountation of interest. now is only an accumulation of interest.

The question is, what can this property pay in indebtedness? That depends upon its net earnings, and if its net earnings are not enough to pay the interest on $10,000,000, there is no use of issuing $15,000,000, because it will be sure to go into bankruptcy again after its reorganization. There is no railroad in the United States, managed by any directors who are business men or whose stockholders have any business capacity, that expects upon reorganization of the property to have greater liens upon it than its net earnings will pay interest on.

As I said before, I do not propose to enter into the details of this question; but under the showings which have been made by gentlemen on both sides of this question, if you let this property go to public sale the Government can not collect the amount of its claim. That is conceded by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell] in his proposition; and it is conceded on all hands, under the information which the committee bring before the House, that on a foreclosure and sale the Government must lose about one-half of its debt or perhaps more.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I had my say, I would say to these people,

"Pay the Government the largest amount of money that you can raise" and let us pocket the loss of the difference. Mr. MAGUIRE. Is not that the thing to be done by foreclosure

Mr. GROW. The evidence is that foreclosure and sale will not give you your debt.

Mr. MAGUIRE. It will give you more than you can ever get The evidence is that foreclosure and sale will not in any other way.

Mr. GROW. Oh, no; it will not. We had a rate once on the public lands of this country of $1.25 an acre, and a proclamation was issued by the President. Who ever heard of an acre of public land at these sales selling for more than $1.25? Put up these railroads at public sale on foreclosure, and in my judgment, unless this Government raises the money to pay the first lien, they will not pay a cent more than the first lien, for the reason that

Mr. MAGUIRE. We have testimony that they will sell for $120,000,000, which would give the Government $60,000,000.

Mr. GROW. There are some more suppositions and beliefs.

With the testimony before us that these roads are not worth the first and second liens, what is the use in talking about somebody giving more than that amount on a supposition or belief?

Mr. MAGUIRE. This committee had no testimony taken; not a word of testimony was taken.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman from Texas who last spoke stated that they had gentlemen before them, and spoke of the whole evidence they had collected, and that they went into a full examination of the subject. He says that the Government could not get more than one-half of its debt from the sale of the property.

Mr. MAGUIRE. That testimony was unsworn statements.
Mr. GROW. What is your statement but an unsworn statement? [Laughter.] Your statement is just as good as theirs.
Mr. MAGUIRE. Exactly; and theirs is worthless and should not be acted upon.

Mr. GROW. And yours is worthless if you have not the

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mine is negative.

Mr. GROW. You have not got the money and do not guarantee Mr. GROW. You have not got the money and do not guarantee that any amount of money would be paid. Money is the most timid of all things; and there is nothing more timid than $1,000,000 except $2,000,000. [Renewed laughter.] Moneyed men do not invest their money in any kind of enterprise without knowing as to its value; and when they have the net earnings of a railroad they know how to invest. If the evidence as to the net earnings do not show that they are sufficient to pay the interest on the first mortgage and on our lien, which is second, at a rate of interest not greater than 2 per cent on the bonds, why expect moneyed men to put their money into this property and give us a first lien and they take a second? There is no money circle in the world charitable enough to do that for our Government.

Should these roads be put up for sale on foreclosure, the Government would have either to take out of the Treasury money enough to pay the first lien, or the owners of the first lien will make the same combination that was always made when we made a sale of public lands by the Government, fixing the price at $1.25 per acre. There would be no probability of the Government realizing anything unless the Government pays the first mortgage. Are we ready to raise money and pay off the first lien? Right here let it be distinctly understood the Government has no more right in this case than any other junior creditor that has invested his money in an enterprise, I do not care what it is.

The Government passed a law in 1862, as was stated by the chairman of the committee [Mr. Powers], when the bands of this Union were loosened, when the spirit of disintegration swept over the country, and when on the western limits of the country, over the Sierras, a spirit was growing up that if there was to be a dis-memberment of the Union they would have a republic on the shores of the Pacific. The great motive for the passage of the act was to bind the country together, when the last spike was driven in the connecting rails of these roads that bound the Pacific to the Atlantic with iron and steel bands. At a time when the air vibrated with the boom of hostile cannon, and the continent shook under the tread of armed men, this enterprise was com-menced, and it was an enterprise on the part of Congress of patriotism.

Congress did not care then whether the Government ever got back a cent or not if anybody would build the road; and a hundred million dollars would have been voted just as quickly if we could have had a certain guaranty that a road of this kind would be built within five years. If it had been proposed to make it a donation even, it would have passed that Congress, if necessary. It was not an investment of money for percentage of profit. It was an investment for a percentage in patriotism, an investment that would bind the Union together and hold it forever. While onewould bind the Union together and hold it forever. While one-half, almost, of our territory was in arms against the other, that law passed. It was a year and a half before any capital made any move to build the Union Pacific. It stood for a year and a half without capital seeking it as an investment. We are told now that money is ready to take this road and pay off the first mortgage; and yet the evidence shows that it is not worth the amount of the first and second mortgage, and would not on foreclosure sale pay more than 50 or 75 cents on the dollar of our claim.

Mr. Chairman, to go back to my first point. We are a board of directors in council settling a plan for reorganizing a railroad, and to submit to the stockholders a proposition by which the road is to be reorganized and continued instead of being disintegrated and sold at foreclosure at whatever it will bring in the market. The Government has no more right, and in fairness and in business honesty, because we have a vote in our power to give as we please, we have no more right, as the junior creditor, to put an exaction upon the first mortgage than we would have as men sitting on the board of a private corporation and because of some power to do so we might have to compel the first-mortgage bond-holders to release a part of their claim. We are bound in good business faith to do the same as we would as individuals (without any vote or power to coerce a particular course of action) of a board of directors in reorganizing a road in which we had indi-vidual interests as junior creditors.

Money seeks investment, and those who put money into great Money seeks investment, and those who put money into great public enterprises are entitled to the benefits that come from them if they take the risk. In this case the capital of this country stood back a year and a half after we passed the law for giving the bonds and the public lands in aid of this enterprise. And right here permit me a diversion. I was always in favor, from the time the bill for the construction of a Pacific railroad came into the House of passing it and building the road. I did not into the House, of passing it and building the road. Idid not care what amount of bonds per mile were to be given, but I would not vote for the land grant, because in my whole life I never gave voice or vote for any disposition of the public lands except to actual settlers. Hence I was opposed to the land grant and would not vote for it, and as I could not vote for the bill without it, I am not on the record either one way or the other. If I stood in the same position to-day, I should favor the bill for bonds, caring nothing about what amount per mile should be given if necessary to secure the building of the road; but I would withhold the land to secure the building of the road; but I would withhold the land grant, and if necessary I would make the amount of bonds large enough to take their place—if absolutely necessary. But that is among the bygones, and I refer to it now only as a historic incident of a personal character.

Mr. Chairman, the question is now, What shall we do in this case? We are legislators voting to give legal power for reorganization to those who invested their money in a great enterprise. It was an enterprise which has made the dream of Columbus a reality. The people of the land of his birth now go westward to reality. The people of the land of his birth now go westward to find the Indies. It opened this great central line of communication around the globe. Our Government invested $64,000,000 of bonds in that great undertaking and now legislation is necessary for reorganization, and we as legislators, in dealing with this question, have no more right to govern our action according to our view of the character of the men who engaged in the enter-prise and carried it through than we would have in dealing with any merely individual enterprise. Neither this enterprise itself nor the men who carried it to success ever received from the Government one bond more than the law gave them. The law fixed the amount at so much per mile, and they never received one dollar in bonds or one acre in land more than the law gave. If they could make money out of the enterprise under those condi-tions, that was their good fortune. They took the risk of losing it. The Central Pacific Company, under a law of California, first commenced work, and soon after Congress passed the law for the building of the roads was in full force in construction. the idea of building a railroad to the Pacific was first taken up, three railroads were in contemplation. One was to be a southern road and there was a controversy between the city of Memphis and one or two other points in the South as to which should be the eastern terminus of the Southern Pacific. Another was to be a northern road, starting somewhere on Lake Superior, and, of course, there was to be this great central road. These projects of three lines across the continent were presented to Congress before the time when a part of the people's representatives here went forth to the battlefield to destroy the Union of our fathers.

Soon after that event this single line was started, and the effort was made to have it completed in as short a time as possible. That effort was successful. The enterprise has been accomplished. The country has received its benefits. We, sitting here to-day, are not required to determine whether the legislation of that day was wise or unwise, or whether the men who engaged in that great enterprise have made money or have lost money by it. Neither are we to inquire whether they have managed their railroads differently from the way the directors and stockholders in other enterprises have managed their roads. The question before us is not one that we can settle by the main strength of our votes if we propose to act fairly and justly with the men who invested their money in this great enterprise which originated in legislation for the unity and benefit of the country and of mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I understand that there is no other gentleman who desires to speak upon the bill this evening.
As I have already said in the hearing of the members of this committee, it was intended when the bill was presented that it should go into operation the 1st of January. That time having passed, it now becomes necessary to change the word "January" wherever it occurs in the bill to the word "July," and also in one or two instances to change "July" to "January." My desire is to offer this amendment and ask the committee to agree to it, in order that the bill may be printed in correct form to-morrow morning. I propose now to offer the amendment for the purpose

I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN. That would require unanimous consent under the rules

Mr. POWERS. I am aware of that, so I ask unanimous con-

I did not quite finish my statement. My proposition embodies one or two other very slight amendments designed to make the language of the bill conform to the differences in the computation of interest. On sundry pages which are specified in the amendment the word "January" should be erased and "July" inserted. Everybody familiar with the bill will understand the reason for that change.

Further amendments which we propose are as follows:

Page 6, lines 7 and 8, strike out "beginning on the 1st day of July, 1897," and insert "beginning on the 1st day of January, 1898."

Page 17, line 24, and page 18, line 1, strike out "beginning on the 1st day of July, 1897," and insert "beginning on the 1st day of January, 1898."

Page 27, lines 6 and 7, for "$2.409,818.20" insert "$2.414,326.21."

Page 27, line 12, before "upon the constituent parts," insert "to the 1st day of July, 1897."

That has reference, I will say, to the computation of interest on the amount of the sinking fund.

Page 27, line 15, after "officers of the Treasury," insert "except that on amounts ascertained to be due on account of services for the Post-Office Department, interest to be computed from the dates of the respective certificates of the Post-Office Department."

That relates to the section of the bill providing that the officers of the Treasury Department shall ascertain the amount which will be due the companies on the 1st day of July for transportation charges. I understand that as to postal transportation charges it is necessary to wait until a certificate can be obtained from the Post-Office Department as to the amount due. This amendment is designed to make that matter plain, Mr. MAGUIRE. I understand the committee reporting this bill now asks leave to make those corrections in its own bill.

Mr. POWERS. That is all.
Mr. MAGUIRE. You do not want the Committee of the Whole to adopt any of these amendments now?

Mr. POWERS. Not at all.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Then I have no objection to the gentleman's

Mr. POWERS. There is one further amendment:

Page 2, line 23, add at the conclusion of clause 2 the following; "And any amounts heretofore forming part of the sinking fund applicable to said companies which shall have been applied toward payment or satisfaction of such subsidy bonds."

I understand that the Treasury Department has sold, or is about to sell, certain bonds in the sinking fund. When this bill was drawn, there was no such sale contemplated. The object of the amendment is that if there should be such a sale before the bill goes into effect the amount of the bonds which may actually have been sold may be applied to the discharge of indebtedness due the Government. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be amended Government. in these respects in these respects.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The gentleman proposes that the committee which reported the bill be allowed to correct it in this way?

Mr. POWERS. Exactly.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I am perfectly willing that all those corrections be made, but I do not want it understood that they are adopted by the Committee of the Whole as amendments to the bill.

Mr. POWERS. Well, I ask that the bill be amended so that it can embrace these points. When we get back into the House, I shall offer a resolution to print some extra copies.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent, as the Chair understands, that the amendments which the Clerk will read be reported to the House—

Mr. MAGUIRE. As I understand, the gentleman's request is

Mr. MAGUIRE. As I understand, the gentleman's request is that the Committee on the Pacific Railroads have leave to make these corrections and have them printed in the bill. That, of course, I am willing to consent to.

The CHAIRMAN. The reprinting of the bill can only be ordered by the House.

Mr. POWERS. With a view to having the bill reprinted, Iask that before the Committee of the Whole rises the Committee on the Pacific Railroads have leave to make these corrections in the

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole can not make The CHARMAN. The Committee of the Whole can not make the order which, as the Chair understands, the gentleman requests. The Committee of the Whole might agree to these amendments and report them to the House.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The gentleman had better make his request in the House. I shall object to it in the way in which the Chair states it. I will make no object to the in the way in which the Chair states it. I will make no objection to the committee being allowed to make those corrections in the House.

Mr. POWERS. That is all I ask. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Bell].

Mr. Bell of Texas. I desire to offer a substitute for the bill, that it may be printed.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done in the House.

Mr. POWERS. I move, then, that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration

Whole on the state of the Union, naying had under consideration House bill No. 8189, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Pacific Railroads be allowed to amend their bill in the particulars that I have already indicated in the Committee of the Whole, respecting a change of dates when the bill is to take effect, and also that 1,000 extra copies of the bill shall be printed for the use of the House.

Mr. McF.W. Lebiect Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of sale.

Mr. McEWAN. I object, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of ask-

Mr. McEWAN. I object, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of asking a question.

Will not the amendments which have already been stated, that are to be made to the bill, be printed in the Record to-morrow morning? I refer to the amendments you have just now sent up.

Mr. POWERS. That is probably true. But I will say to the gentleman that several members who have been using the original bill to-day find it difficult to follow the changes that have been made, and at their request and for the convenience of the members of the House I have asked that the bill be printed in the amended form. the amended form.

Mr. KYLE. I suggest to the gentleman that he also ask for a

Mr. Notes. I suggest to the gentleman that he also ask for a reprint of the report.

Mr. POWERS. I think there is a sufficient number of the reports, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. McEWAN. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. POWERS. There are several amendments indicated on a slip of paper that the Clerk has, and also on a copy of the bill as prepared by the committee. The request is for unanimous consent for the adoption of these amendments by the committee, and then that the bill be printed as so amended to the number that I have stated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the bill, amended in accordance with the suggestion submitted by him to the Committee of the Whole, be printed, 1,000 extra copies for the use of the House; and that that bill be considered as the pending bill before the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I understand that these are mere corrections made in the bill by the Committee on Pacific Railroads, for which the gentleman asks consent. To that I have no objection. Mr. POWERS. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

Mr. POWERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, to further complete the bill, I ought to say, in the hearing of the House, that an amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Hepburn] was agreed to by the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, but in his absence it was inadvertently omitted in preparing the printed bill. We have assured him that he should lose no standing by reason of that fact. I therefore ask unanimous consent to incor-porate that amendment in the bill which is to be acted upon by the Committee of the Whole.

On page 30 of the bill, after the word "service," in the fourth line, proposes to strike out the remainder of that section and insert in lieu thereof what I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment. The Clerk read as follows:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in line 4, on page 30, section 22, all after the word "service," down to and including the word "thereon," and insert:

"And that said companies hereinbefore mentioned, their successors, lessees, and assigns, shall cooperate in making track connections with all railroads of other companies now or hereafter built to points of junction with their roads; and at any point where two or more railroads shall connect with their roads or either of them they and their successors, lessees, and assigns shall afford to all such connecting roads equal times, terms, rates, and facilities for the interchange of traffic, both passenger and freight, between such connecting roads and their respective roads and every part thereof. And any contract, arrangement, or device by sale, lease, consolidation, through-car service, or otherwise, intended for or resulting in any preference or advantage whatsoever to any such railroad so connecting at any such common point, or which shall subject any such railroad so connecting at any such common point to any prejudice or disadvantage whatsoever, is hereby declared to be unlawful."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the additional correction

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the additional correction proposed by the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill will therefore be printed, and submitted to the committee with the changes indicated.

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those members who have addressed the House on this subject may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. BELL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I have a substitute for the bill which I propose to offer at the proper time, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made.
There was no objection.

The proposed substitute is as follows:

There was no objection.
The proposed substitute is as follows:

Mr. McMILLIN. I should like to ask the gentleman what printing this embraces?

Mr. BROSIUS. Oh, some testimony taken on two bills. It is a very small amount and will cost very little.

Mr. McMILLIN. What are the measures upon which the testimony was taken?

What we call the retiring-fund bill and a bill Mr. BROSIUS. for the extension of the civil-service law to the District of Columbia. The amount of testimony is very small, and it will cost very little money to print it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration

Mr. GROSVENOR: Mr. Speaker, I shall object unless I can know one thing. I want to ask the gentleman whether these hearings have all been ex parte, whether any notice of these hearings has been given, and whether anybody else has been heard except the affirmative side of this question.

Mr. BROSIUS. Every person has been heard who expressed a desire to be heard, and both sides have been heard. Testimony has been taken on both sides.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
There was no objection.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider House bill 8189.

to consider House bill 8189.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to make the motion. Under the rule adopted by the House, the House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 8189, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. PAYNE, will please take the chair.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 8189.

mr. FOWERCS. Mr. Chairman, 1 yield thirty influtes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and in view of the very great importance of this measure, I deem it to be a duty which I owe to the House to briefly recount the reasons which have influenced my judgment in coming to the conclusion that I ought to support this bill. As the time given is very limited, I hope that the House will permit me to assign these reasons without interruption.

There is a side to this question which may be termed the sentimental side. It finds expression in the declaration that the promoters of these railroads were great public benefactors; that they practically converted a wilderness into a land of promise, and that the Government has made vast sums of money by reason of the construction of these railroads.
